It would be a simple date. We would take a sleigh ride across a snow covered field basking in the moon lit evening. To warm up, the two of us would drink champagne and cuddle by the fire until dawn. Oh yeah, if my date was Elle MacPherson, that would help. A lot.

Without a doubt my dream date would have to be the incredibly gorgeous Chris O'Donnell. The character he played in Mad Love sent me head over heels. We would spend the night star-gazing, or something equally romantic. Ahhhh…

OK, here's the master plan. David Justice's entire bat collection accidentally falls on his head while he's cleaning out his garage one February morning. Dazed and confused, he wanders in the house and tells Halle Berry he wants a divorce on the spot. And just guess who shows up on Valentine's Day to switch her to a new sport. Get your spikes, baby — I'm gonna run away with your heart.

It depends on the mood I'm in. If I were looking for a man, my dream celebrity date would probably be with Keanu Reeves. I like my men strong and stupid — that's right, you do what I say, no questions asked. It would probably also involve lots and lots of sex.

If I were looking for a woman, my dream celebrity date would definitely be Mary Stuart-Masterson. After watching her butch-wannabe in Some Kind of Wonderful, I know that she would be fabulous. And that's all I have to say about that.

Television celebrates Black History

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Nine hopeful young voices, sharing tales of Harlem life both joyful and bleak. Nine unguarded young faces, eyes fixed on a future of boundless possibility.

"Harlem Diary: Nine Voices of Resilience" is an intimate, stereotype-shattering look at youngsters — and a community — refusing to accept limits or failure despite the toughest obstacles.

The Discovery Channel film is part of a rich exploration of black American experience offered this month on television, which usually has a knee-jerk tendency to relegate blacks to flimsy sitcoms.

The occasion is Black History Month, and cable channels in particular are doing themselves proud in marking it. While the pain and glory of the past come alive, there's a focus on the here-and-now as well.

Let's start with the vivid "Harlem Diary," which debuts at 9 p.m. EST Sunday, Feb. 25. The documentary from sociologist Terry Williams and filmmaker Jonathan Stack allows each youngster to tell his or her own story.

Williams, author of "The Uptown Kids: Struggle and Hope in the Projects," formed a writers' circle to guide young New Yorkers toward self-expression and insight.

"I feel lucky that I realized the right way before ending up somewhere I couldn't return from," says 16-year-old Rasheem Swindell, an aspiring boxer who has watched violence and crime defeat so many of his friends.

"People ask me why I'm so serious," says Barr Elliot, 17, a budding hip-hopper musician. "Life is serious. Got people out here hating each other because of their skin. … I really try to love myself and always love another like myself."

Williams said in a telephone interview from New York that the "Writers' Crew" he formed in 1989 ended up serving as a counseling group and employment center as well.

And, of course, as the source of the documentary Williams hopes will be an eye-opener about Harlem.

"Don't see the community as a monolithic entity, just as drug dealers or crime or single parents," he says. "See this as a diverse community, as a community that's constantly growing and changing and reaching for something positive, what everybody wants: a home, a job, to raise a family in a positive way."

Other programs to watch for during Black History Month (all times EST):

• "In the Life," PBS (broadcast dates and times vary; check local listings). The newsmagazine attuned to gay and lesbian issues reports on the growing gay presence in Atlanta's annual march honoring Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and examines other topics from a black-gay viewpoint.

• "This Century," 8 p.m. Thursday, Feb. 8, Learning Channel. The anthology series offers "The Last Lynching," an examination of the 1930 hangings of two black teenagers in Marion, Ind. The Thursday, Feb. 15, program is "Nightfighters," a look at black aviators; the civil rights' anthem "We Shall Overcome" is the topic Thursday, Feb. 22.

• "South Bank Show: Voices of Rap," 7 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 11, Bravo. Explores the world of rap and hip-hop in America and abroad.

• "Freedom's Road: Slavery and the Opposition," 8 p.m. Monday, Feb. 12, History Channel. How Colonial America laid the seeds of its own near-destruction by allowing slavery.

• "The Journey of the African-American Athlete," two parts, 10 p.m. Monday, Feb. 12, and Monday, Feb. 19, HBO. Rare film footage and interviews with Hank Aaron, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, Cheryl Miller and others are featured.

• "Frederick Douglass," 8 p.m. Tuesday, Feb. 13, History Channel. Profile of the eloquent activist who fought for the abolition of slavery and later served as U.S. minister to Haiti.

• "The Q Factor," 11 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 14, Black Entertainment Television. An inside look at composer-musician-producer Quincy Jones, including the personal as well as professional.

• "Digging for Slaves," 8 p.m. Friday, Feb. 16, History Channel. A look at how archaeologists are finding evidence of slavery's brutality and discovering black contributions to American society.

• "America's Dream," 10:15 p.m. Saturday, Feb. 17, HBO. An original dramatic trilogy adapting short stories by writers Maya Angelou, John Henrik Clarke and Richard Wright. Cast includes Danny Glover, Wesley Snipes and Jasmine Guy.

• "The Parent 'Hood," 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 21, The WB. In a special episode of the sitcom, the Petersons are in turmoil because 8-year-old Nicholas wants to portray Buckwheat of "Little Rascals" fame for a Black History Month school presentation.

• "The Black Caricature," 9 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 21, BET. An examination of the black image in movies, film, literature and music featuring, among others, filmmakers Gordon Parks and Melvin van Peebles.

• "Architect to the Stars: Paul Williams," 9 p.m. Sunday, Feb. 25, Home & Garden Television. Dubbed the grandfather of black architects, Williams designed public buildings, churches and posh homes — many in neighborhoods from which his race barred him.

Tips for that Valentine dinner

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Picture this: You plan a romantic candle light dinner for two in some quiet out of the way French bistro. The sound of violins and flutes play in the back ground as you enter the dimmly lit restuarant.

A maitre'd with a thick accent and a snooty stare escorts you through the restaurant to your table across the plush oriential rug and into an alcove hidden partcially by a velvet curtain and tropical ferns.

You fish into your jeans that haven't benen washed in ???? days for a fiver, slap the guy on the back and plunk down into your seat. Loudly, you summon the "garcon" (you rhyme it with "car phone") for a bottle of their second least expense champaign and complain bitterly when you find the menu is in French.

Once the meal comes you get violently upset when you realize what you ordered really wasn't a hamburg and fries and it's on fire. Swearing and cursing you stamp out the flames with your cloth napkin, spill your water and reduce your date to tears.

Let's face it, you don't belong here, you're uncomfortable, and your date is mortally embarrassed.

Welcome to Valentine's Day Dinner 101.

Okay, so you want to impress her, wine her, dine her — show how James Bond like you can be. Only you're not James Bond and you have no clue. The key to a sucessful dinner? Fashion, food and etiquette.

Pick a place to go that you're comfortable in. If you are the kind of person that prefers Bon Jovi to Bach and beer over wine, why put yourself into a situation where you feel socially inept. Go somewhere where you can be yourself and you can relax. If you must go to a place that is tres chich maybe a pre-Valentine's test run would be good.

Fashion — pick clothes that fit the place your going to. A suit and a tie in McDonald's looks just about as out of place as ripped jeans and a T-shirt in Season's. If you don't have the clothes or know the dress code find out. Don't feel stupid, your paying them to serve you.

Third, manners. They're a big selling point. You can look chic but as soon as you open your mouth or start eating your fish with a dessert fork, it's all downhill. Find out about the table setting and if your confused about the silverware remember to work your way from the outside in. Or call Mom, Mom will know and she won't laugh.

Still lost? Watch Martha Stewart's show "Living." This lady can made a three tier wedding cake out of a cup of screws, some perrican, raw hide and glue. She knows etiquette and she knows most of us are real clueless.

So don't stress, keep a level head, track of your bud get and relax — it's only one day.

Anti-masking law controversial

Klu Klux Klan's use of public access television causes debate

By Roxana Hegeman
Associated Press

LAFAYETTE, La. — White-robed Ku Klux Klan figures dance around the 34-foot cross ablaze in an empty field.

Then the cameras cut to the panel inside the television studio. Seated behind the Confederate flag and a semiautomatic assault rifle is the Klan's imperial wizard, wearing the purple robe that denotes his high rank. With him are three masked guests, one draped in camouflage and wearing a netted mesh mask. Two others sit nearby, bandanas covering their faces.

The discussion topic is preparedness — for hurricanes, for race riots like those that struck Los Angeles.

"I am prepared. I have food. I have weapons — get them while you can," a masked guest urged his audience.

It is Dec. 17, 1995. The call-in show is the "Klan in Acadiana," broadcast twice monthly over public access television. The calls range from freedom of speech to the quality of public education.

In this Cajun heartland, an obscure anti-masking law has pitted the Klan and a black activist group in a First Amendment fight over what can be aired over a public access cable television channel.

At issue is whether a state law that prohibits wearing masks or hoods in public can be applied to public access cable television. The controversy has escalated since three masked men appeared on a Klan program that aired Dec. 17 over Acadiana Open Channel.

Charges are expected to be filed against the masked men, and additional charges may be lodged against others involved in the program, Assistant District Attorney Floyd Johnson said.

"The law passed in 1924. The first television broadcast was in 1930. Tell me how the framers could have considered television when they wrote the law," says Darrell Flinn, imperial wizard of the Knights of White Kamelia and the show's host.

But the local NAACP chapter president, Aaron Walker, argues that the anti-masking law is clear. "They start out using their First Amendment right and the next thing you know we have a full production of a lynching or cross-burning on TV."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People backed by the black chairman of the Lafayette Parish Council — asked the district attorney's office to prosecute.

"They are upset and they are angry and they don't like what we say," Flinn said. "This mask thing is a way to suppress free speech."

If convicted, the men could be sentenced to six months to three years in the parish jail, Johnson said. He said his office decided to prosecute because "it is on the books and we got a complaint."

The NAACP contended that the appearance on the public access channel, which is available in 4,800 homes in Lafayette, constitutes a public wearing of masks as prohibited by the Louisiana statute.

Japan–Red Sox trade in the works?

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In what would be the first trade between American and Japanese major league teams, the Boston Red Sox are discussing a deal to acquire pitcher Robinson Checo from the Hiroshima Toyo Carp after the 1996 season.

Carp spokesman Takashi Hamada said the possible move would send Checo, 24, to the Red Sox for a player to be named and perhaps some cash.

"However, terms for the trade and other details have yet to be finalized between Hiroshima, Boston and Checo," Hamada said Wednesday. "They now share only a general understanding for the trade."

The Carp and Red Sox are expected to sign a formal agreement before the season ends, Hamada said.

Though Hideo Nomo, Cecil Fielder and other All-Stars have moved between Japan and the United States, those deals have always been straight cash transactions. Never before have players from the two countries been traded for each other, and such a move would indicate increased cooperation between the two baseball offices.

Any player on the 40-man roster that Boston wants to trade to Japan must give his written consent, the commissioner's office said. But the Red Sox do not need such permission to deal a player not on their major league roster.

Boston and Hiroshima began talking last month after Checo expressed an interest in pitching for the Red Sox. On Wednesday, Boston general manager Dan Duquette declined to confirm or deny that the teams have spoken about a trade.

"The Red Sox are well aware of Robinson Checo," he said. "We have expanded our international scouting and we are always evaluating talent on a worldwide basis to constantly help our team."

Checo, from the Dominican Republic, was 15-8 with a 2.74 ERA last year as a rookie in Japan. A hard-throwing right-hander, he also has good command of his curve.

On Monday night, pitching for the Dominican Republic in the Caribbean Series, he struck out Roberto Alomar and Bernie Williams and held the team from Puerto Rico that also has Ivan Rodriguez to three hits in six shutout innings.

Checo became the center of a dispute that involved the commissioner's offices in Japan and the United States near the end of last season.

Signed for a base salary of $47,500, Checo claimed the Carp gave him just his housing and other allowances, while the team said he had been fully paid.

In November, the Japanese commissioner's office asked its counterpart in the United States to investigate a charge that the New York Yankees had tampered with Checo.

Checo's agent, Don Nomura, also represents Nomo, who left Japan last season and became the NL Rookie of the Year with Los Angeles.

The commissioner's office, however, found no wrongdoing, saying there had been no negotiation for a contract between the Yankees and Nomura.

In January, the Carp and Checo reached agreement on a 1996 contract for about $300,000. At that time, the Carp said, Checo said he was interested in playing for Boston.

Before pitching in Japan, Checo played in a baseball academy in the Dominican Republic that was run by the Carp.

Players in Japan can become free agents after 10 years, although Nomo left after only five years by officially retiring. During the offseason, the Japanese commissioner's office turned down Seibu Lions pitcher Kotsuhiro Maeda's request to retire, fearing he might also use that route to play in the United States.

Nomo was the first Japanese player in the American major leagues since Masanori Murakami pitched for San Francisco in 1964-65. Both Fielder and Bob Horner both left American teams, found great success in Japan and returned to the United States.

Julio Franco and Pete Incaviglia have returned this season from playing in Japan, and Kevin Mitchell is looking for a job with a team in the American major leagues.

Winfield to call it quits after 23 seasons

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Dave Winfield, the major league leader in hits and RBIs among active players, has called a news conference for Thursday and a source familiar with the situation says the 44-year-outfielder will retire.

The 12-time All-Star, who played for Cleveland last year, has spent 23 seasons in the major leagues with San Diego, the New York Yankees, California, Toronto, Minnesota and the Indians.

His agent, Jeff Klein, declined comment. But another person, speaking on the condition he not be identified, confirmed the purpose of the news conference was to announce Winfield's retirement.

Winfield, a five-time Gold Glove winner, didn't give any hint of his plans when he talked with a reporter last weekend. All he would say was that he was in great shape.

He finished with a .283 career average and in the top 20 of many career categories: 3,110 hits (14th), 1,833 RBIs (11th), 465 homers (19th), 11,003 at-bats (sixth) and 2,975 games (seventh).

But he hit just .191 in a limited role with the Indians, with two homers and four RBIs in 115 at-bats. He went on the disabled list twice with an injured left shoulder, and Cleveland didn't include him on its postseason roster.

"Let's just hope I'm having a positive influence," he said during the World Series. "There's no need to get into how I feel now. The guys here know what happened to me."

Winfield joined the Padres in 1973 after becoming an All-America at the University of Minnesota, never spending a day in the minors. He was the fourth pick overall in the baseball draft, and also was selected by the Atlanta Hawks in the fifth round of the NBA draft, by the Utah Stars in the sixth round of the ABA draft and by the Minnesota Vikings in the 17th round of the NFL draft.

While he became a star with the Padres, his 10-year contract with the Yankees — a deal that turned out to be worth just over $17 million — made him a celebrity.

Yankees owner George Steinbrenner counted on him to replace Reggie Jackson, but soured on Winfield after he went 1-for-22 against Los Angeles in the 1981 World Series.

In September 1985, Steinbrenner called Winfield "Mr. May," playing off Jackson's nickname of "Mr. October." Steinbrenner and the David M. Winfield Foundation were involved in three lawsuits against each other.

Syracuse beats Pitt, Wake stops FSU

No. 18 Syracuse 73, Pittsburgh 67

PITTSBURGH (AP) — It was a matchup that looked absolutely dreadful on paper: Syracuse's imposing John Wallace and Otis Hill against Pitt's mostly underclassmen front line.

Of course, Pitt hardly ever matches up well against Syracuse, and this would prove no exception. Wallace scored 25 points and Hill added 21, including a rally-killing three-point play down the stretch, as No. 18 Syracuse held off a second-half Pitt comeback for a 73-67 victory Wednesday night.

Wallace, Hill and Todd Burgan, who had 10 points, scored all but 17 of Syracuse's points as the Orange (17-6, 7-5 Big East) beat Pitt for the ninth consecutive time since Jan. 8, 1992.

The Orange are 20-7 against Pitt in the Big East.

"We just got killed inside," Pitt coach Ralph Willard said. "We got annihilated. They kept coming up with all of the loose balls, all of the rebounds. It was really disappointing, it really was."

Wallace, who is 6-foot-8 and 225 pounds, had 11 rebounds and the 6-8, 255-pound Hill added 10 as Syracuse outrebounded Pitt 44-31. They were so dominating early as the Orange opened leads of 17-8 and 25-12 that Pitt could play much-hyped 6-11 freshman Mark Blount only 11 minutes.

"I was the same way when I was a young player going up against (former Pitt center) Eric Mobley," Hill said. "I had to learn quickly, because (Mobley) was going to be right there in your face all night."

Hill had 18 points as Syracuse led by as many as 14 points in the first half but he did not score in the second half until his three-point play gave the Orangemen a 69-61 lead with 1:40 remaining.

"We came out flat in the second half, when we should be putting teams away," Hill said. "We keep letting them come back against us."

Pitt (9-10, 4-7 Big East) closed to within four points for the first time since early in the game, at 63-59 with 4:47 left, but scored only once more until Chad Varga hit two 3-pointers in the final 23 seconds. The Panthers lost their seventh in eight games.

"Wallace and Hill probably played the best together they have all year," Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim said. "They were looking for each other, really looking (to pass) to each other. But, in the second half, we didn't have the same defensive intensity we had in the first half."

John Wallace

Varga scored 20 of his 26 points in the second half as Pitt, coming off an 88-55 loss at No. 6 Villanova, went on a 10-2 run early in the half and a later 9-2 run to threaten the upset.

"You have to expect the home team to have a run in the second half,' Wallace said. "We came out flat early in the second half, but this was a good road win for us because we did not play well in three of our last four road games."

Wallace made 9 of 10 free throws as Syracuse overcame its 1-of-9 three-point shooting by making 22 of 26 free throws.

Jerry McCullough, Pitt's top scorer with a 14.7 average, fouled out with eight points on 2-of-13 shooting.

Syracuse, winning in Pittsburgh for the fourth consecutive season, opened leads of 10-4, 17-8 and 25-12 and later went on a 10-3 run that made it 35-21. Hill had 18 points and Wallace had 12 at halftime.

McCullough's steal and layup later finished off Pitt's 10-2 run and cut Syracuse's lead to 46-41 with 14:34 remaining, but the Panthers never got any closer until their late stretch drive. Wallace moved past former Pitt star Charles Smith into 11th place on the career Big East scoring list.

No. 9 Wake Forest 81, Florida St. 67

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. (AP) — When opponents stop Wake Forest's Tim Duncan from having any fun, that usually means teammate Rusty LaRue gets a chance to have plenty.

Tim Duncan

Florida State shackled the 6-foot-10 Duncan with double- and triple-teams Wednesday night, opening up the door for LaRue, the Demon Deacons' top 3-point shooter, to start firing away from the perimeter.

"Any time I see zones, I'm happy because that means more looks for me," said LaRue, who powered a second-half run that sent No. 9 Wake Forest into sole possession of first place in the Atlantic Coast Conference with an 81-67 victory over the Seminoles.

LaRue, a senior guard, hit six of seven 3-point attempts and scored a career-high 22 points as the Demon Deacons (15-3, 7-2 ACC) took a half-game lead in the league over North Carolina and Georgia Tech.

"This was a great way to start the second half of the ACC season," LaRue said. "Every game's a must win in this league, especially at home."

The Demon Deacons made 32 free throws, six more than their previous season high, and 11 3-pointers, one short of their season high. Wake Forest extended its school-record for consecutive victories at home to 17.

Florida State (10-9, 2-7) used a variety of zone defenses and a frequent foul strategy to harass Duncan into 1-for-4 field-goal shooting and five turnovers.

But Duncan, whose lone basket came with 3:45 left, sank 15 of 16 free throws and finished with 17 points and seven rebounds.

"It was very irritating," Duncan said. "But I just tried to block it out and hope everyone else stepped up and took advantage of open shots. They did."

"We just tried to not let him shoot the ball," Florida State coach Pat Kennedy said. "We tried to be as physical with him as we could."

Wake Forest hit 22 consecutive free throws and wound up with a 32-of-39 performance from the line to help doom the Seminoles to their fifth loss in a row.

"I feel better about our effort tonight," Kennedy said. "We're obviously having a very difficult time scoring points, and it's difficult to win when you're not in a position where we can have some guys consistently knock down some shots."

Florida State trailed by 12 early in the second half before going on a 10-0 run. Geoff Brower scored five points and James Collins, who led the Seminoles with 19 points, had the other five, including a dunk that cut Florida State's deficit to 45-42 with 15:39 remaining.

LaRue took over at that point by scoring the next eight points, starting a 15-3 run that propelled Wake Forest to a 60-45 advantage at the 9:24 mark. LaRue hit all four of his shots in the surge, including three 3-pointers, and wound up with 11 points.

Florida State countered with a 3-pointer by Scott Shepherd but got no closer.

The Demon Deacons extended their advantage to 78-55 on two foul shots by Duncan with 2:24 remaining.

Jerry Braswell added 12 points for Wake Forest, which also got 10 each from Sean Allen and Steven Goolsby.

Brower had 17 for the Seminoles and Shepherd had 15.

lead to full blown AIDS. Whoa, slow down — AIDS in the NBA? No. One common misconception people possess is that HIV and AIDS are equivalent. However, medically, studies show that one who is HIV positive may not necessarily get AIDS. Granted, HIV still carries a fatal risk, and it is that risk which has led to concern from several of Magic's colleagues.

When Magic first attempted to un-retire some three years ago, there were a number of NBA players that vehemently objected, citing Johnson's condition as a severe health risk. One of the most notable dissenters was perennial all-star Karl Malone. Malone even went so far as to go on television to convey his message in commercials.

In a recent television interview, Magic was asked if he had talked with Malone about his feelings. Magic stated that he had sat down with Malone and the two eventually came to a better understanding about just what sort of risk Magic's condition presents to his fellow athletes. Johnson also proclaimed that he did not follow through with returning the first time because of the unrest in the league. However, Johnson is said to be happy with Commissioner David Stern's reaction since that time.

In a television interview Johnson said, "Commissioner Stern has truly done a wonderful job in educating the players and the players have done a wonderful job educating themselves," Johnson said.

Unfortunately, even education will not solve any fear that the public may have.

Magic will enjoy success in the near future because he has worked tremendously hard for it. Johnson spent more than three years with former NBA player Lester Conner and bodybuilder Marchell Henry sharpening his shots, adding 27 pounds and polishing his confidence.

Just about every day after Johnson's 1992 retirement from the Lakers, Magic's friends have joined him in a strenuous routine of weightlifting, stretches, sit-ups, jogging and yes, basketball.

In an Associated Press story Conner said, "he never stopped working. The sports world, the public, everybody's surprised at what he did that first game. We weren't."

In his first game last week, Johnson's Lakers beat the Golden State Warriors 128-118, before a loss to the Bulls and a win Sunday night over the Jazz. Johnson, 36, has played 90 minutes, scored 55 points, pulled in 18 rebounds and handed out 19 assists in his three games back. Magic has simply taken over "his team."

Numbers aside, Johnson himself has shown HIV patients around the world that life is not over. While Magic's comeback is a step forward for some, his condition should not be overlooked. Johnson's life has changed dramatically, as he must watch everything that he does, from what he eats to how much he sleeps. For the slightest imbalance in his body's composition can trigger the harmful effects of HIV.

Magic's return has conjured up certain issues of the game that are not dealt with on a day-to-day basis. Many have said that Magic's return was months in the making, giving time for league officials to prepare for the wide variety of questions that still exist. Personally, the return of one of the game's greatest should be applauded, to a certain extent. It would be a travesty if Magic and others around him acted like he never left and that his condition is not important. For then, all of the wonderful things he has done for the advancement of AIDS education would be discounted.

However, the showman of Showtime has yet to indicate that he is headed in such a direction. With that in mind, why shouldn't little Earvin get to see daddy play?

have our last meet there," she said. "This is the best team we've had so far, and everyone has blended together really well right from the start."

From her freshman year, Baker's only thoughts were on just making the team. As her four years will attest to, she has definitely accomplished much more than that.

"I'm really happy with what I've done," Baker said.

Kristen Chapelle has definitely been an overall contributor for the Minutewomen this season in the freestyle, breaststroke and butterfly events. She expressed her thoughts about her years in swimming with the team, and what this last home meet means to her.

"I'm really excited for it and I think it will be a lot of fun," she said. "I've had a good four years. Of my four years this has been my favorite. The team really jelled well, everyone gets along, and everyone's always up for each other."

Chapelle said that it was good to contribute throughout her career and that she's learned a lot swimming different types of events.

"I've had a lot of variety, and I've made a lot of friends," Chapelle said. "The thing I'm going to miss most is that you're never going to have 30 or 40 people so accessible to you, that would do anything for you. That's my favorite part of the team."

Jessica Griffith will complete a fine senior year as well, topping the charts in the breaststroke and freestyle events with strong finishes right up with her teammates. Her spring season will continue with water polo, however, she expressed thoughts on what the end of the season feels like.

"It's going to be exciting, but sad," Griffith said. "The seniors would always kid around how we're so excited to finally be done, but it's going to be sad. It's going to be hard to leave everybody, and not have a team there anymore."

Griffith also said how she thought this year's team was the strongest in a while, and that she felt she accomplished a lot.

"It's definitely one of the stronger, most talented teams I've been on here," Griffith said. "All the personalities have worked together well. Everybody has a lot of confidence this year, and we've really popped back the past few weeks."

Meghan O'Connor has been a consistent swimmer this year for the Minutewomen also, in events such as the individual medley, the butterfly and freestyles. She also will be participating in water polo at the conclusion of the swimming season.

"I'm excited to be moving on and to do something else, but it's gonna be kind of a sad day because I've been swimming for so long. It's been such a big part of my life since I was young," O'Connor said. "I think I've improved a lot, swimming-wise, and my whole attitude about everything."

O'Connor also felt that the teams togetherness was a big plus all year long.

"The team's been really close," O'Connor said. "The freshman came in and we all just kind of blended in really nicely. It was a small team and it was nice. There was more camaraderie... definitely the most fun year."

There are times when you wish you could do more than watch the world pass by in a haze of wonder and a cloud of what if's.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
by Jeane Dixon

ARIES (MARIES (March 21 – April 19) — (This could be the best day of your week!) An upsurge of confidence is indicated. Do not let wealthy friends decide what is best for you financially. Gambling tips are unlikely to pay off.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — When considering a change, remember that being comfortable is very important to you. Lifestyle decisions should not be dictated by money alone. A friend's invitation could lead to romance.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — A misunderstanding at home could hamper progress at work. A compromise will clear the air. Keep your ambitions in proper perspective. Self-restraint is essential.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — The work scene will be more crowded than usual. Dress your best and seek the limelight. Put your artistic talents on display. A good evening for anything that gives you food for thought.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Your go-getter attitude moves you closer to financial security. Others acknowledge your accomplishments. A raise or promotion is possible. Pooling funds with a friend for fun and profit, proves highly rewarding.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — A bold approach will impress your co-workers. Tackle new tasks with confidence. Choosing your words carefully will prevent misunderstandings. Voicing your heartfelt concerns helps create good feelings.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Friends may be well- intentioned but poorly informed. Do not rely on the information they provide. A curtailed social schedule keeps you on a steady course where work is concerned.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — Becoming a member of a special team or group holds great promise. By joining forces with others, you gain companionship. Romance is a source of joy.

I TOLD YOU THIS PROJECT WOULD TAKE A YEAR. BUT ON MY OBJECTIVES YOU SAY I MUST HAVE IT DONE IN THREE MONTHS.
WHICH OF THESE REASONS BEST DESCRIBES WHY:
A. YOU HAVE GREAT CONFIDENCE IN ME.
B. YOU THINK I PADDED MY ESTIMATE.
C. YOU HATE MY GUTS.
WE DON'T REALLY NEED THE PROJECT IT'S JUST A WAY TO KEEP RAISES LOW.
I JUST FELT A LITTLE DIP IN MY MOTIVATION

"Hey Bob, I just thought of something really funny. Imagine if some guys were building a supermarket and they accidently made it say Shop and Stop instead of Stop and Shop"
I mean people would like, go in and shop. But then they would see the sign and say 'Well, I've shopped now. It's time to stop.' Then they would leave. That's so funny! I'm going to tell them now.

Top 10 Signs that you belong in a funk band

10. You spell any word that begins with an 'f' with 'ph' (i.e. Phat phunky music).
9. You punctuate sentences with "you dig?"
8. People call you "Kool" and you hang with a group of friends known as "the Gang."
7. Two words: Soul glow.
6. Your height? 5 feet 4. Your height with your boots on? 7 feet 8.
5. You own a "Jive–English, English–Jive" dictionary.
4. You're not Vanilla Ice.
3. After a music lesson, the instructor says to you, "You know, you really belong in a funk band."
2. Your name is "Bootsie."
1. You have a George Clinton shrine in your house.

My friend Mark Niznik asked Gabe,

"Correct me if I'm wrong, but has Bob Dylan taken a turn for the worst? I saw him on MTV unplugged last night and he looked as if he'd been unplugged.....by Dr. Kervorkian."

Then Gabe said,
"He should've stayed home in bed.

He's gonna end up in a petting zoo.

Dylan won't make it to the next century."
Too bad..... I always thought I'd meet Dylan someday. I idolized him.

He's a songwriter of great subtlety and depth.
Ah....who cares?..he hasn't called me lately anyway.

UMass looking to extend home winning streak

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

The clock is ticking as the Massachusetts women's basketball team embarks on its final month of Atlantic 10 conference play. Coach Joanie O'Brien's Minutewomen are fighting hard to break themselves of a win–win–lose pattern which began earlier in January.

On tap for UMass (13-7, 5-4 in the A-10) this evening is conference rival Temple (4-15, 1-8), which will be looking to break the Minutewomen's eight game home winning streak. The last time the two squads met was during the Blizzard of '96, which saw UMass unleash its own shooting blizzard on the court in Philadelphia, walking away with a 30-point victory.

The Minutewomen have momentum at their backs, as they have not lost a game at home since Feb. 11, 1995. The key for another big UMass win is consistent play. When the squad arrives in the arena on all cylinders, they can go seven deep with intense players that could give most of the A-10 a run for its money.

Thus far, the staple for the Minutewomen has been the play of senior co-captains Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile, who both top the record charts. Thomas has cinched the top spots in the UMass record books for free throw attempts and free throws made, while Gurile boasts the record for all-time blocks. In fact, Thomas will be looking to break yet another all-time record for UMass tonight against the Owls, as she needs just one more rebound to break the current record of 851.

Temple has its work cut out, as it earned its first A-10 victory in two years with a 61-54 victory over Fordham on Jan. 27. Leading the Owls is Claudrena Harold who averages 12.1 points per game. On the rebounding end, junior Alkanese Garrett, a transfer from UMass two years ago, leads the Owls pulling down six boards per game.

Last weekend's dismantling of Fordham, 72-50, was highlighted by inspiring bench play, as all players off the bench tallied points in the outing.

Adding more good news to the Minutewomen's strong bench play was the impressive showing by the rookie players. Freshmen Iayvana Bradley, Lucia Madajova and Yolanda Rayside each put in some quality minutes on the floor.

"They've all improved tremendously," O'Brien said. "I think you're going to see their opportunity to play growing and growing, which will not only make them better, but will make us a better team. We'll be able to go nine or 10 deep."

As of late, fouls haven't been a major problem for UMass, but if the play at the tail end of the season begins to get more physical, prompting more fouls, the squad has a solid bench to fill in the gaps.

Overall, shooting has shaped up to be the strongest aspect of the Minutewomen's game. On the line, UMass is ranked No. 1 in the nation with a 76.1 percent average on the season. In addition, Massachusetts has out-shot its opponents from the field, .479 to .372.

After Temple, UMass closes out its four game homestand with Xavier and Duquesne, before travelling to face some A-10 West opponents.

The team's biggest hurdle before the conference tournament is a home matchup against Rhode Island on Feb. 27 to close the regular season. The Rams, who currently sit atop the A-10 East standings with a 5-1 conference record, beat UMass earlier in the season. A strong showing in February would put the Minutewomen in a great spot when March arrives.

The Magic is back in Los Angeles

Darren Cohen on the NBA

He said it was for his son. Why shouldn't little Earvin get to see daddy play? What took him so long?

All are questions that still surround the return of Earvin "Magic" Johnson. Johnson returned to active duty with the Lakers last Tuesday after being out of action for four and a half years. One may ask why many have sufficient doubts about Magic. Can Johnson resurrect what is left of the Showtime era? After all, Michael Jordan still leads the Bulls, why can't Magic do the same in L.A.?

Truth is, there are a number of reasons why Magic's return should be lauded. Not only is his professionalism sorely needed in the league, but as every one knows, Magic is HIV positive. Johnson's medical condition in itself creates a number of issues that need to be debated.

There is no question that Johnson's return does wonders for the Lakers. With a young nucleus made up of potential studs in Nick Van Exel and Eddie Jones, superb role players in Cedric Ceballos and Vlade Divac, Magic gives L.A. the consummate professional it desperately needs.

Upon return, Johnson also instantly injected life into the Great Western Forum, an arena that at one time needed no introduction. Magic said himself, "You could feel it, it was back again." What is "it" you ask? "It" is what basketball means to me, "it" is what basketball should mean to you, "it" is the aura of greatness, the essence of invincibility and the unexplainable rush of adrenaline one gets when being a part of basketball at its highest level, athlete, fan or ordinary citizen.

When one thinks of the term HIV positive, it is hard to see any light at the end of the tunnel. For those who may be unaware, HIV is the disease that can and usually does

UMass–B.C. rivalry will continue

Minuteman Notes

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

With the announcement that Massachusetts and Boston College have signed a three-year FleetCenter deal, the Minutemen's new-found rivalry with the Eagles will continue, as the two teams will meet in the second annual Commonwealth Classic on Dec. 7.

After the extremely successful matchup on Dec. 9, 1995, in which UMass came away with the 65-57 victory, both UMass coach John Calipari and Boston College coach Jim O'Brien wanted to see the game happen again.

"We would love to play this game again, not just for us, this is great for college basketball," Calipari said. "It's great for New England college basketball and it should be played. This is special because what it stands for — it's about New England basketball."

"This may have been the single best atmosphere for a game that I've been involved in," O'Brien said. "That atmosphere was second-to-none, it was terrific. I think this certainly was good for the basketball in this city."

A sellout crowd of 18,474 was on hand for the first-ever men's college basketball game held in the FleetCenter.

"Getting these two schools together for the first collegiate game in the FleetCenter produced an electricity throughout Boston and the state," FleetCenter President and Chairman of the Board Larry Moulter said. "We couldn't be more pleased that we will have them back the next three years. This has already turned into a very special event, a new tradition."

"People who thought Boston and New England did not have a strong college basketball following had their eyes opened," UMass athletic director Bob Marcum said. "With the strength of the college basketball in New England, the only thing that prevents this from becoming another Tobacco Road is that the schools don't play each other. Boston College and UMass have taken a step to change that."

The game on Dec. 7 will once again be carried on CBS, according to CBS Sports Vice President of Programming Len DeLuca.

Weeks making his mark

Junior forward Tyrone Weeks had been outstanding off the bench for the Minutemen lately. The 6-foot-7 inch banger has been the first player of the bench for Calipari in the last few games and has made an impact.

In the Minutemen's overtime victory against Xavier (Feb. 4), Weeks pulled down a team-high 13 boards while also scoring nine points. The 13 boards was also a career-high.

In UMass' game against Temple on Feb. 1, it was Weeks' defense on Temple's Mark Jackson during the second half, when Marcus Camby was in foul trouble, that helped UMass claim victory. He also grabbed seven rebounds in that contest.

Then in UMass' win over Fordham on Tuesday, Weeks was solid once again, finishing with eight points (4- for-4 from the field) and pulling down seven boards.

His improvement over the last few games hasn't gone unnoticed by his coach, or opposing coaches as well.

"I think Tyrone is playing great basketball right now," Calipari said. "He's playing with emotion. He's the one guy off the bench who's producing for us."

"Weeks is turning into a very good player," Fordham coach Nick Macarchuk said. "He's becoming better and better as time goes on."

Basketball's success has impacted many

Mike Reiss

Four of us were on our way to Philadelphia to watch the Temple–UMass game at McGonigle Hall last Thursday when the sports discussion started.

Will Donta Bright make it in the pros? Will UMass men's basketball remain undefeated the rest of the season? Is Marcus Camby coming back to school for his senior year?

We were our own sports radio station. Out of all the questions, the one that truly captivated my imagination was this: Whose lives have been impacted the most by the rise of the UMass men's basketball program?

To a list that will be added to each week, our first responsibilities are Bill Bayno and Jim Calhoun. Bayno, the former assistant at UMass, is currently in his first year as head coach at UNLV. Surely, if it weren't for UMass' resounding success in the '90s, Bayno wouldn't have been in the position to move on.

As for Calhoun, he is no longer the trump card of college basketball coaches in the Northeast. For those who have dealt with him closely, they know this bothers him almost as much as losing itself.

• If a ballot was in my hand today, my votes for Coach and Player of the Year in college basketball would go to John Calipari and Marcus Camby.

• Reason No. 1 why men's basketball shouldn't go undefeated: If the season were to end today, the team would most likely end up a No. 1 seed in the East. That would likely set up a rematch with Kentucky, who can't play in the Southeast region (regional is on its home floor) or West region (regional is played at same time as the Southeast). The Wildcats would be a No. 1 seed in the Midwest.

Because the East is paired up with the Midwest this year, that means UMass would meet Kentucky in the round of four. If I'm John Calipari, I want to play Kentucky as deep into the tournament as possible.

• If you're a veteran to this campus, you might remember the column Scott Shotts, written by Dave Scott. Dave was spotted at the UMass–Temple game last Thursday, and is now working at College Sports magazine. Hats off to College Sports for finding itself a top-notch talent.

• Don't look now, but the UMass spring sports teams are already practicing and getting ready to open up its seasons. Softball starts at the end of the month, and the rest of teams follow soon after.

• Speaking of softball, the team lost star pitcher Kelly Daut to graduation, but the word out of Totman is that there are three pitchers more than capable to take center stage.

• For those who forgot, the baseball team had three players drafted last year. Mark Pileski went to the Mets, Bill Knight to the A's and Nelson Ubaldo to the Astros. UMass coach Mike Stone continues to produce major league talent.

• Men's lacrosse has a tough schedule as usual, with regulars Syracuse, Duke, Brown and Notre Dame highlighting the slate. UMass coach Greg Cannella enters his second season, and there is optimism for a 14th NCAA tournament appearance and a national championship run.

• Women's hoop is in action tonight against Temple (7 p.m.) at the Mullins Center. There are only a few more home dates this season for the Minutewomen, and it would be nice for the fans to give at least one more cheer for seniors Melissa Gurile, Octavia Thomas, Tricia Hopson and Nicole Carter. The four have been labeled the "building blocks" of a program that had no wins the season before they came to UMass.

• If you see media relations guru Mike McComiskey or women's soccer midfielder Rebecca Myers on campus, wish them a belated happy birthday.

• Another reason to hate Valentine's Day, besides the fact you have no one to spend it with: The only time the UMass' men's hoop team lost at the Mullins Center came on Feb. 14, 1995, against George Washington.

• Did you know that UMass has 29 Division one varsity sports? The last team to go to a Final Four was Russ Yarworth's water polo squad, this past season.

• If any of you have any suggestions as to how I can convince my roommates that Big Monday on ESPN is a sound alternative to Melrose Place, your advice would be much appreciated.

• Saturday at the Mullins Center, it's UMass vs. UMass–Lowell on the ice. The two have split the season series 1-1 so far, and the game will decide the Alumni Cup, given to the team that wins the season series.

UMass prepared for last home meet before A–10s

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

In its final preparation meet before the Atlantic 10 Championship, the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team will take to the pool in 5-3 2 record against conference opponent Fordham, in a duel meet this Saturday in Joseph R. Rodgers, Jr. Pool in Boyden.

This meet will be the last home contest this season for both the Minutewomen, and more importantly for the seniors, who will take to the pool one last time in Boyden in their UMass careers.

After Saturday's meet, which is scheduled for 12 p.m., the Minutewomen will be off for a week and-a-half to prepare for the A-10 Championships, which begin Feb. 22 in Buffalo, N.Y.

However Fordham is first, and UMass coach Bob Newcomb is not taking the Rams lightly.

"I always worry about taking teams too lightly," Newcomb said. "Fordham has a good history of swimming, and I don't want the team to let down. I want another good meet going into the Atlantic 10 Championships."

This year has been very successful, not just in the pool, but all around for both Newcomb and the swimmers. Above the pool in Totman Gym, the team's training facility, is a list of goals the Minutewomen had for the season. They have been very committed to each goal throughout the year, achieving each of them, but there is one left — a third place or higher finish at the A-10 Champion-ships.

The team achieved second place at the New England Invitational, beat B-C and matched last semester's GPA (above 3.0), while having fun no matter what.

"The thing I've asked them to do this year they've done, and done it well. I'm really proud of this group," Newcomb said. "Personality and quality-wise, this is the best team I've had. There are some really good teams I've enjoyed in the past, but overall, this is the best."

Fordham is a struggling team, but as one has seen all year in UMass sports, no one can be written off or taken with minimal respect. The Minutewomen will look to come off with an impressive victory before the A-10's, as will the seniors, who will touch the water in Boyden for the last time.

Sarah Baker has swam phenomenally for the Minutewomen all year long in the 50 and 100-yard freestyle races. Her name has been seen atop the charts in virtually every meet. She had a lot to reminisce about her four years at UMass.

"I'm so used to having something to work for, for next year, and now I don't know what I'm going to do," Baker said. "And now it's done... I don't feel like it's over."

Baker said she will find it hard to leave the confortsof Boyden.

"We've had a lot of good memories in Boyden and I think it will be fun to

Pres. signs telecom bill; Internet access affected

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton signed legislation Thursday he said will "bring the future to our doorstep" by opening new forms of communication through telephones, TV sets and computers. Surrounded by books — some more than 200 years old — at the Library of Congress, Clinton signed the bill both the old-fashioned and the high-tech way — first using a regular pen and then an electronic one.

"Today, with a stroke of a pen, our laws will catch up with our future," the president said.

The law, already under legal attack by groups opposing an anti-indecency provision, revamps the Communications Act of 1934. Opponents — mostly consumer groups — also say more jobs will be lost than gained through consolidation and that cable and telephone rates likely will rise because the level of competition envisioned by supporters will not emerge.

It will let local and long-distance phone companies and cable companies into each others' businesses, deregulate cable rates and allow media companies to expand their holdings more easily. Supporters say the measure will boost jobs, expand consumer choices and potentially lower prices for cable, telephone and other communications services.

"This new law is truly revolutionary legislation that will bring the future to our doorstep," Clinton said.

Just hours after the signing, AT&T Corp. Chairman Robert Allen described plans to expand into the local telephone market as early as this summer. Allen said he thinks the company can win "at least one third" of the $90 billion local phone market in five to 10 years, he said.

The law, for the first time, outlaws transmission of indecent and other sexually explicit materials to minors over computer networks. It also would require new TV sets to be equipped with a special computer chip to allow parents to zap from their screens programs electronically rated for violent and other objectionable content.

"With freedom, comes responsibility," said Clinton, who is to meet with members of the TV industry Feb. 29 in part to persuade them to rate their programs. If they don't, the chip is useless. The American Civil Liberties Union and other groups are challenging the anti-indecency provision. They say it is too broad and would outlaw electronic transmissions of legal speech, including literature such as "Catcher in the Rye," some rap lyrics, and some contend, discussions of abortion.

With the signing, portions of the Internet went into "virtual mourning" to protest the provision, with some changing the background color of their World Wide Web pages to black.

Supporters, including the Christian Coalition, say the provision legally regulates indecent speech to protect children.

The ceremony took on a humorous note, as Vice President Al Gore bantered over the telephone with comedian Lily Tomlin, playing her familiar role as telephone operator Ernestine.

"A gracious hello," Ernestine said, her digitized face glowing from a TV monitor on the stage. "Have I reached the party to whom I am speaking?" To Clinton, she said, "I can just see the headlines. Bill signs bill."

The new law, Clinton said, "clearly enables the age of possibility in America to expand to include more Americans. It will create many, many high-wage jobs. It will provide for more information and more entertainment to virtually every American home."

Law sparks competition for phone companies

By Evan Ramstad
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Getting through dinner without a call from a phone or cable company that wants your business could get tougher now that the telecommunications overhaul is law.

There are plenty more calls ahead, along with mail offers and broadcast and print ads, as local phone, long-distance and cable companies — freed of all sorts of regulatory barriers — try to muscle into one another's business.

Even though you won't be able to take phone calls on your TV set for years, the advertising blitz has begun.

"It is a nuisance at times," said David Rua, an insurance agent in Pittsburg, Kan., who gets calls from long-distance companies who want his business. "But that's free American enterprise. If you try to cut that down, that's saying they can't compete."

The driving purpose for the biggest communications legislation since 1934 is competition. Few companies wanted time adapting to it Thursday.

Less than an hour after President Clinton signed the bill, the largest local telephone company, GTE Corp., announced it had a contract with WorldCom

SGA dispute settled by judiciary

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

The findings of the Student Judiciary in the matter of Sen. Pete Luongo vs. Speaker Dan Castellano were officially announced by Student Government Association Chief Justice Chris Lang Wednesday night at a SGA Senate meeting.

The dispute originated in Senate proceedings last semester, when Castellano presented a motion proposed by Sen. Bill Ramsey — to show the Senate's support for the Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP) — from being added to the agenda.

At the time, the Senate Ways and Means Committee was considering eliminating the DVPs budget in full.

Ramsey's motion was intended to be a show of moral support for the DVP. However, Castellano ruled it "dilatory," meaning that he felt it would not utilize the Senate's time constructively, and thus did not place it on the agenda.

The motion "expressed a opinion that did not mean a whole lot," said Castellano. If passed, the opinion would not have authorized any formal action on the matter.

"I didn't think it was proper for the Senate to interfere with the work of [the Ways and Means Committee] to influence a decision that they had not even made at the time," Castellano said. "It's a very fundamental power for the Speaker to have control over the agenda," he added.

Luongo, however, disagreed, taking Castellano before the Student Judiciary to resolve the issue.

Luongo said Castellano's actions were unconstitutional and were influenced by his alleged opinions on DVP funding.

"He was one of the people pushing the committee to zero fund," said Luongo.

Luongo said he supports the DVP and believes their funding should not be eliminated. He also said Castellano should not have the power to strike a motion dilatory before it is placed on the agenda.

The Student Judiciary agreed, stating in their ruling that "the Speaker must place all motions that adhere to

Tenants sue The Boulders in discrimination case

By Roseann Cohen

When a new Boston-based company bought The Boulders apartment complex on East Hadley Road and pumped nearly $2 million of work into the complex to improve its "image," they were not expecting a discrimination suit.

The Housing Discrimination Project (HDP) of Holyoke, along with several of the current and former tenants of the Boulders, filed their suit in October 1995 against Essex Partners of Waltham. The group claims that the management at The Boulders has been discriminating against Hispanic tenants and Cambodian-American tenants on the basis of national origin and familial status.

Under the new ownership, The Boulders converted three and four-bedroom units to two-bedroom units, pushing out many of the families who make up a large part of the minority population at The Boulders.

"I have been told by The Boulders that I cannot live here anymore because I have too many people in my family," said Andrea Morales, as quoted in an HDP newsletter. "I have lived at The Boulders for six years and never had a problem — now The Boulders tells me that I will find another apartment sooner if they make me homeless." Morales is one of the tenants in the case.

The tenants have allegedly been forced to leave their apartments because they were served eviction notices when Boulders decided to convert their four-bedroom apartments into two-bedrooms. The tenants claim to have heard of no complaints from the management prior to the eviction. In addition to the evictions, other long-time tenants were refused lease renewals and given no explanations.

The Boulders is also accused of adopting a policy of denying applicants with families larger than four members the opportunity to rent the newly converted two-bedroom apartments.

Essex Partners took over the Boulders in December 1995, up until which at least 55 percent of all occupied units were occupied by residents with Hispanic or Cambodian surnames, according to a document filed by the seller at the Hampshire County Hall of Records. However, as of only a year later the Boulders claimed to have a 35 percent minority occupancy rate.

Robert Gatof, principal of Essex Partners, questioned the statistics cited in the complaint. "We do not maintain any statistics on the racial or ethnic make-up of our complex... we don't track them," he said.

But when the remodeling was taking place Gatof said, "This place isn't going to be a ghetto anymore," according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Gatof also denied evicting tenants without reason, claiming that it was because of "chronic rent delinquencies" or various other complaints against the tenants. However, he refused to comment on specific tenants mentioned in the complaint.

The HDP sent trained individuals to pretend to be potential tenants looking for apartments. The testers had the same credentials except for their national origin, or familial status. According to court documents, the testing showed that "the Boulders' rental practices were much more rigorous for the Hispanic tester than the non-Hispanic tester." The Hispanic tester, although she had more of a favorable credit rating than the non-Hispanic tester, was asked for more references. In addition to having better credit, the Hispanic tester also had a more secure source of employment than did the non-Hispanic tester.

Gatof declined to comment on the fair housing tests HDP had conducted, although he stressed that Essex Partners was a victim of the political agenda of HDP.

"This is the first time we have ever been involved in a lawsuit and we're taking it very seriously," he said. "We categorically deny the allegations of discriminatory activity and we are prepared to defend this action vigorously."

BOSTON — After a investigation of more than two years, U.S. Ambassador to the Vatican Raymond L. Flynn admitted Thursday he improperly spent campaign funds on himself and his family and agreed to pay it back.

In the settlement, announced 90 minutes before a deadline the attorney general set for filing a civil lawsuit against him, the former Boston mayor agreed to reimburse his mayoral campaign committee $12,500 for private expenditures.

The committee also will pay a fine of $10,000 to the state. In March of 1994, Flynn repaid $3,400 to his committee, a payment which counts toward the agreement announced Thursday, Attorney General Scott Harshbarger's office said. Flynn also acknowledged that his campaign committee failed to keep adequately detailed and accurate records of its receipts and expenditures, and failed to file proper campaign finance reports for the years 1988 through 1993.

Flynn, who signed the agreement by fax from Rome, must make the reimbursement within 90 days. His committee had to pay its fine Thursday.

"To prove a case against Ray Flynn, in order to meet the burden proof beyond a reasonable doubt, you need witnesses and evidence," said Ed Cafasso, a spokesman for Harshbarger. "If we had had those two things, we would have charged him criminally."

At the same time Flynn was negotiating his settlement with the attorney general, his former chief aide, Joseph Fisher, was in federal court admitting that he accepted illegal gifts while serving on Flynn's staff.

In a statement, Attorney General Scott Harshbarger said: "The agreement reinforces the fact that no candidate or campaign committee has the right to ignore their responsibility to abide by the laws meant to ensure an honest political process."

Flynn could not be immediately located for comment.

16–year–old murdered, sister, boyfriend charged

AYER, Mass. (AP) — An 18-year old woman was charged Thursday with conspiring with her boyfriend to kill her younger sister, whose body was found in a garbage bag with a bicycle chain around her neck.

Prosecutors said Heather Santerre, jealous over her sister Stephanie's interest in Paul Reed, told Reed to kill the 16-year-old on Super Bowl Sunday. Heather Santerre left the house, but returned in time to see Reed, 19, holding the chain around her sister's neck.

"She walked over to the body, checked to see if she was still breathing. She was not," said Jill Reilly, a spokeswoman for the prosecutors' office. "Then they stuffed her into a trash can overnight and dumped her the next day in the park."

Assistant Middlesex County District Attorney John McEvoy said Heather Santerre reported Stephanie missing Jan. 29 after disposing of the body.

At the time, Heather Santerre told police that Stephanie had left the Groton home the sisters shared with Reed's family after an argument.

Acting on a tip, police found a plastic bag containing the teenager's body in Willard Brook State Park in nearby Ashby on Wednesday. Heather Santerre and Reed were arrested later that day. Santerre and Reed, who sometimes goes by the name Paul Jones, were arraigned in Ayer District Court on Thursday. Innocent pleas were entered for both.

Heather Santerre was ordered held on $150,000 cash bail on charges of conspiracy and being an accomplice after the fact of murder. She returns to court Feb. 16 for a bail hearing.

Reed was ordered held without bail on one count of murder. He was sent to Bridgewater State Hospital for psychiatric evaluation, pending a March 6 pre-trial hearing.

His attorney, Michael Natola, said he had serious questions about Reed's competency to stand trial or to be held criminally responsible for the slaying. Reed had been undergoing treatment for emotional problems, depression and attention-deficit disorder until three years ago, Natola said.

Scott & Crosson push for AAU membership

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Yesterday afternoon, Chancellor David K. Scott stressed the importance of becoming a member of the American Association of Universities (AAU) while Provost Patricia Crosson explained the present state of her Academic Program Review at the regular meeting of the Faculty Senate.

"The University should move toward being an AAU land- grant university," said Scott. "This synergizing concept will ensure that each major area of knowledge will progress greatly."

Membership in AAU usually leads to more grants and research scholarships. The Chancellor said that the University is currently competing with the University of Connecticut for the one open AAU position.

Under the mandate of the University Trustees, Crosson has formulated an Academic Program Review in order to restructure the campus' 64 departments. A report from the provost was issued to all faculty and governance bodies on Dec. 15, 1995.

Phase one of the Academic Review Program will merge six departments with other units, reduce three departments' resources and terminate or cessitate eight departments. In all, 19 departments are receiving one or more reduction.

"I wish the resource situation was different," commented Crosson. "I would like to listen to everyone's requests, but the re-allocation of resources is absolutely necessary."

In phase two of the provost's review program enhancements and investments will be identified. Through Crosson's plan $20 million will be reallocated in campus- wide support of campus strategic directions.

The provost has received numerous responses from the affected departments. The responses will be considered by the campus administration and the Faculty Senate Priorities Council.

The President of the Graduate Student Senate stated that the Academic Program Review will have negative impacts on the campus and he demands reconsideration of the review.

"I have heard strong cases from all of the departments," stated Crosson, "Through debate with faculty, trustees, administrators and the council we will decide upon resource adjustments in the best interest of the campus."

Crosson's Academic Program Review is undergoing a convergence process with Scott's Strategic Thinking Document.

"The Academic Program Review should converge with the Strategic Thinking Document; but it is like we are changing the fanbelt of an engine while it is running," stated Scott.

After 15 years of saving funds, the Division of Continuing Education purchased the building at 358 North Pleasant St.

"Although the Division is far from moving in," said Crosson, "The new building has been purchased and will allow for greater accessibility for continuing education students."

Secretary of the Faculty Senate, John Bracey commented on President William Bulger's reluctance to speak with the Faculty Senate.

"Bulger is still warming up a bit and will come to speak to us sometime in the spring. We must respect his caution and allow him time to adjust to the University," said Bracey.

A possible increase in out-of-state tuition was mentioned. The Chancellor stated that he will speak to Bulger about stopping the potential increase.

White House checks regulator's story on Whitewater

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Deeply concerned about what a state bank regulator might say about Whitewater, presidential aides discussed sending someone to "make sure her story is OK," a newly discovered White House document shows.

With the Whitewater probe intensifying, the plan to approach the regulator about her comments on Hillary Rodham Clinton was so risky that discovery would mean "we're done," one aide quoted another as saying at a meeting in January 1994.

In a disclosure that may further extend the Senate Whitewater investigation, the White House turned over former communications director Mark Gearan's handwritten jottings — months after they were demanded by the Senate committee.

White House lawyer Jane Sherburne told the committee Thursday that Gearan inadvertently took the notes with him when he left the White House to run the Peace Corps last September.

Gearan took the notes at a Jan. 7, 1994, meeting of White House aides the month after appointment of a Justice Department prosecutor to take over the criminal investigation of Whitewater. One area under investigation: Mrs. Clinton's contact with Arkansas securities commissioner Beverly Bassett Schafer about whether the savings and loan at the center of Whitewater could issue stock. Schafer concluded the S&L — represented by Mrs. Clinton's law firm — could indeed do so. Schafer had said during the 1992 presidential campaign she wasn't pressured by Mrs. Clinton and had only one conversation with her.

According to Gearan's notes, the aides at the meeting, including Harold Ickes, now deputy chief of staff, debated whether Clinton loyalists from Washington should approach Schafer. In the end, Clinton adviser Bruce Lindsey apparently was designated.

Ickes is quoted as saying no emissaries from Washington should be sent to Arkansas to contact Schafer because "it will come out."

The notes quote him as uttering two expletives and concluding that if contacting Schafer somehow went awry, "we're done." "Let's not talk it to death — let's just get it done," Gearan's notes say, referring to comments by Ickes. At one point in the meeting, Gearan scribbles, "Try to poke holes in their story." At another point, Ickes is quoted as saying, "item by item — make sure her story is OK."

Gearan's notes prompted Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, to question whether the Clinton White House had been trying to influence the statements of a Whitewater witness.

But White House spokesman Mark Fabiani said presidential aides were simply seeking to have Schafer repeat comments she made that were supportive of Mrs. Clinton's Whitewater role.

Senate Whitewater Committee member Robert Bennett, R-Utah, said Ickes must be brought before the panel to testify.

The January meeting apparently stemmed from President Clinton's request to aides 2 1/2 weeks earlier asking whether the Arkansas securities commissioner would reiterate her comments. In the margin of a New York Times editorial on Whitewater, Clinton scribbled to Lindsey and then-chief of staff Mack McLarty: "Bassett did a good job in camp. on this — can she now?"

According to Gearan's notes, Ickes proposed having someone besides a Clinton loyalist from Washington contact Schafer — Little Rock public relations executive Skip Rutherford, Little Rock lawyer John Tisdale or a New York lawyer friend of Democratic political consultant Paul Begala.

Those from Washington mentioned in Gearan's notes as possible emissaries to Schafer: senior presidential adviser Lindsey; Begala, then a Washington political consultant, and White House aide Mike Waldman.

Eventually, Lindsey, a Little Rock native, apparently was chosen to get in touch. Schafer told the Whitewater committee that she may have spoken to Lindsey about that time to "get the facts to him about what did happen."

Separately, the Clintons' private Whitewater lawyer, David Kendall, and White House lawyer Sherburne testified Thursday about the mysterious appearance at the White House of the billing records outlining Mrs. Clinton's work for the savings and loan.

Sherburne said that when the records surfaced Jan. 4, she proposed to others at the White House that they not be copied so that Whitewater prosecutors could check for fingerprints.

She said the suggestion was rejected because the Clintons, the Senate committee and others needed the material immediately. It was turned over the next day.

Kendall said, "I can't think of a plausible human reason" why someone would hide the records.

It goes to the possibility that someone took the records out of Vincent Foster's White House office after he died, said committee chairman Alfonse D'Amato, R-N.Y.

Inc., the fourth-largest long distance company, to resell long-distance service under the GTE name. A few minutes later, AT&T Corp. chairman Robert Allen stood before reporters in Washington and said the largest long-distance company would offer local phone service by late summer.

The goal for all is to become a one-stop provider of whatever communication service a customer seeks. The industry buzzword is "bundling," or offering discounts for taking more than one service.

"There's certainly going to be a rise in the level of the noise that's out there," said Cliff Eason, chief executive of SBC Communications, the telecommunications arm of SBC Corp., the regional Bell carrier in Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas.

"But I think customers will have an attentive ear to a company that comes at them and says, 'Here's the deal. It's simple. It's reliable. It's hassle-free.'"

Investors will have to sort through a frenzy of deal-making over the next few weeks. Communications companies will be forging alliances and buying other companies.

For consumers, many of the new choices will take months to appear — perhaps several years in small towns and rural areas. But the big marketing push will be felt everywhere and, in some places, has already started.

For instance, NYNEX Corp. since last weekend has run TV commercials with World War II-vintage planes that declare, "The telephone wars are heating up." It points out the company's special rates, now open to competition, between New York City and suburbs on Long Island and in Westchester County. The announcer urges viewers to stick with the company that brings "peace of mind."

the prescribed By-law form and procedures... upon the appropriate Agenda," regardless of how productive the Speaker feels the motion will be.

The Speaker will still have the power the strike a motion "dilatory" during a Senate meeting, but now it will only require a simple majority rather than a two-thirds vote within the Senate to overrule that decision.

Castellano said he was concerned about the future of the Speaker's position due to this ruling.

"I was sightly distressed in the sense that I don't want the speaker to become a robot," said Castellano. The position "needs the room to interpret the gray areas in the By-laws."

Despite his frustrations, Castellano said the ruling was "constructive."

Luongo said "it's important to distinguish the power of the Speaker and the Senators," adding that he thought it was "a good ruling."

The hearing lasted for over four hours, in which Luongo and Castellano were present, arguing on their behalf. This is the third case in which the Student Judiciary has heard since its inception in 1994.

Lang, who has served on the court since that time, first as Associate Chief Justice, said that RSOs "should know that this option is available to them," to settle potential disputes.

Lang consulted with Attorneys from Student Legal Services throughout the process to ensure legal consistency in their methods and final judgement.

Both Luongo and Castellano emphasized that their professional relationship would not be effected by the hearing

A fecal matter

Paul Mills was one of 20 U.S. students spending a semester at the University of Melbourne in Australia last spring. For the first few weeks down under, Paul spent most of his time with Americans.

After he became more acclimated, Paul began hanging out regularly with his Australian classmates, especially Walter, who lived in his dormitory.

About a month into the semester, Walter had a favor to ask of his American buddy.

"Paul, I have this friend named Gail, who is fascinated with the States and Americans," Walter began. "When I told her that I had a friend from the States, she got excited and asked if I might set the her up with you on a blind date."

Paul, who was single and hadn't had a date since he had arrived, agreed and told Walter to give Gail his phone number.

Two nights later Gail called him. After the two chatted for a while, Gail asked if Paul might like to get together some time.

"Sure," he responded expecting the offer of a dinner or a movie.

"Good," she said excitedly. After the two determined that the next Friday would be a good time for both of them she said "Okay then why don't you come over and have dinner with my parents and me?"

As they hung up the phone, Paul sat bewildered.

"Dinner with parents on the first date?" he thought. "I haven't even seen the girl yet. Well I am in another country... maybe this isn't so weird."

So in the days preceding the encounter, Paul looked forward to the date. When Friday rolled around, however, Paul was not as good. Something he had eaten the previous night left him with a slightly upset stomach and a case of diarrhea.

His friends suggested that he cancel, insisting that the date couldn't possibly be a good time if Paul didn't feel well.

After weighing his options, he decided to go, realizing that if he were in her position, he'd be upset if she cancelled because it would seem like a blow-off excuse. He borrowed Walter's car and drove to her suburban home.

Her parents seemed nice enough. Her father was a tall round man with a pleasant smile, a strong handshake and a corny sense of humor.

"Dads are the same all over the world," Paul thought with a smile.

Her mother was friendly and reminded Paul a bit of a former teacher from elementary school. The conversation flowed freely between all involved. Gail's family was eager to ask questions about Paul's homeland, and being a little homesick, he was more than happy to talk about it.

The pleasantness of the setting made Paul forget his stomach for a while.

But halfway through the roast that Gail's mother had painstakingly prepared, Paul suddenly realized that he had to get to a toilet, and there wasn't much time to waste.

After Gail's father finished telling a story, Paul asked to be directed to the bathroom. He was pointed down a long hall, and after leaving the dining room, he began to sprint toward it.

His excretory system wasn't waiting, so he pulled down his pants as he closed the bathroom door. He was just about to sit on the toilet to relieve himself, when he slipped on the newly mopped tiles.

As he fell to floor, the dam broke.

He stood up horrified. Surveying the damage he realized, that he had not only got the tiles, but a large portion of the plush bath mat, and shower curtain as well. No amount of scrubbing with toilet paper was going to clean up this mess.

There was no way that he could walk back to the dining room and explain this in any way that could be remotely acceptable.

So Paul took his only option. He unlatched the window and climbed out, got in his car and left.

"Paul, how'd the date go?" his roommate asked as he walked back into the room.

"Kinda crappy."

Choose or lose

The decision was simple: to pick up or not to pick up the phone. Yet the event paralyzed me. The rings sounded close together so I knew it was off campus. At 12:13 a.m. it could either be an emergency — but I'm an optimist — or him. The hardest thing I had to do in a long time was to make this choice.

The Friends episode after the Super Bowl exposed two good friends fighting over a man. Maybe I would dump my friend too if it meant Van Damme, but situations like those are no laughing matter. More than scripted friendships are at stake.

As if your emotional turmoil isn't enough, your personal life is transformed into melodrama better than daytime soaps. Everyone who knew you, the ex and the other will watch your every action waiting for a reaction, a sign of hurt or a scene. God forbid that all three of you end up at the same place, then supposedly the sparks will fly. Those who have played any of the three roles tell a different story (of course, not me, nope, no siree).

Let me clear up something before I continue. I don't mean stealing your friend's boyfriend. That's just plain conniving and if that's the case, then that person didn't deserve to be your partner or the other your friend. If you're the villainous thief of the story, then ask yourself why you want something that isn't originally yours. Did your parents buy you Snoops when you wanted G.I. Joe? Made you learn Irish clog dancing when you ballet classes? Sent you to UMass when you wanted UPenn? If you've got unsettled business, take it up with a professional, not your trusting friend.

I'm not talking about relationships sabotaged by these sickos with complexes. I'm referring to someone you liked, maybe even loved, but for reasons beyond your control, it failed. Out of nowhere—BANG (no pun intended)—your friend and the ex are inseparable, compatible, a spectacle of blooming love and devotion. Then there's you. Last person to find out, last person to see it coming ... the key word is LAST. You feel left behind by both your friend and the person who used to scratch your back. When did this happen?

If you're lucky, things were very, and I mean very, over between you two before the trade-in happened. In that case, you're too relieved from being out of that relationship to care who's next in line. If seeing them together affects you then you still care and I recommend moving to another town and learning from your experience. Or smile, realize it's not the end of the world, and say to yourself, "the little things in life never bothered me." It may not help your sanity, but it will help you keep your dignity.

Last night a friend's ex called me at 12:13 a.m. I didn't pick up the phone. I opted for the friendship instead.

TOLES
THE 'YOU CAN GO UP BY SAILING DOWN' IDEA

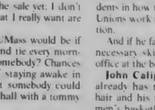
Are you talking to me?

Judging from the goods at the poster sales in the Campus Center Concourse and the Student Union Ballroom, it is plainly apparent that gangster movies are a very hip thing amongst my age group. Pulp Fiction, Reservoir Dogs, Goodfellas and posters from similar movies are taking prime sales positions, and according to a worker at one of the sales, they're going fast.

I haven't bought any posters from the sale yet; I don't really want gangster movie posters. What I really want are real mafiosos on campus.

Think of how much more exciting UMass would be if there were people who put on a shirt and tie every morning to go kick the living crap out of somebody? Chances are you'd have a much easier time of staying awake in class if you knew that at any moment somebody could burst through the door of your lecture hall with a tommy gun and orders to kill you.

The only thing remotely resembling gangsters at UMass now is the Keiber Crime Family. They don't really do anything illegal, it's just what my friend Cameron likes to call his group of close friends.



Cameron used to call my group of friends the Rodriguez Crime Family, after my roommate Mike Rodriguez. Our crime family disbanded last May when Mike graduated, giving the Keiber Crime Family 100 percent control of ... well nothing.

We were going to have a gun fight with the Keiber Crime Family on Amherst Common one day last spring. But the combined factors of there being a rally on the Common that day, as well as the reality that none of us own guns cancelled the event.

Still, I like gangster movies and I believe that gangsters would add a definite flair to the flavor of Amherst's diversity. Think of the possibilities:

Martin Scorcese as the Chancellor: Like our present Chancellor David Scott, Scorcese is a pleasant speaker in interviews, despite using elaborate words that no one really understands. What Scorcese holds over Scott is an unbelievable ferocity that allows him to film scenes of men having their heads crushed in a vice.

Think of Chancellor Scorcese at a Trustees' meeting: when things aren't going his way, in bursts Joe Pesci with the intent of squeezing the Trustees' heads until they give into the Chancellor's demands.

David Scott, on the other hand, just lacks the spine and the savoir faire to be tough.

Professors Deniro and Pesci: These two esteemed men would head up the new Mob Arts department. With courses like "Corpse Hiding 200" and "Famous Fits of Violence in Dimly Lit Bars," the department would offer majors a chance to bypass the hit-man stages of the criminal corporate ladder and proceed straight to Union Boss.

Associate professors John Travolta and Samuel L. Jackson would follow their rookie performances as gangsters in Pulp Fiction by instructing the freshmen level course "Hit Men 101."

Rob Faulkner as himself: The sociology professor would continue to teach his popular "Social Deviance" class, but it would be renamed "How To Make Economic Gains In A Shady Fashion." Faulkner would school students in how to run a flawless Ponzi scheme, how to make Unions work for you and how to "eliminate" the competition.

And if he failed to school prospective gangsters in these necessary skills, you'd be able to find him in his new office at the bottom of the Connecticut River.

John Calipari as the basketball coach: Calipari already has that gangster look with his slicked back hair and his finely tailored suits, but in this script the men's basketball team would no longer be undefeated. They would have lost a crucial game to perennial underdog St. Bonaventure, and the bosses would be passing the lucrative benefits of their gambling winnings on to Coach Cal in the form of a healthy bonus for point shaving.

And remember all that flack that came up last year when some of the basketball players' grades were leaked to the Boston Globe? If that had happened under the Gangster Plan, any professor giving an athlete a grade lower than a B would be taken to Rick Russo's Pizzeria & Gangster Emporium to have their head jammed in an oven.

Whitey Bulger as himself: When the University's President mysteriously disappears, Whitey emerges from hiding to fill his brother's vacant, concrete filled shoes. He takes the reigns of the University with a ferocious tenacity that allows it to emerge as one of the premier training grounds for aspiring mobsters. (A minor media scandal is averted when a Collegian reporter's legs are broken as a warning of greater things to come if he doesn't sit on his story that Bulger had spent the past year hiding as the janitor in Butterfield).

Bill Bulger's remains are unintentionally uncovered several years later when ground is broken for the Al Capone Firing Range.

In retrospect, I see that the campus is not ready for organized crime, or any crime beyond vandalism and petty pot possession. For now, maybe we should just allow the Keiber Family to retain their not-ruthless-enough of campus mobs.

But if you should get the itch to knock them off, bear in mind that you'll need a gun. A squirt gun should do it, but you might want to take a b.b. gun just to be safe in assuming your rightful spot as the Campus Crime Boss.

Appeal for Travis Roy

To Coach John Calipari:

Boston University hockey star Travis Roy sustained massive injuries to his neck during a collegiate hockey game earlier this year. Most students and faculty members at UMass are aware of this recent tragedy. His hospital bills are, and will continue to be, astronomical.

Last month, a gentleman from Texas "passed the hat" for Travis at a Dallas Stars hockey game. He raised approximately $35,000 for this worthy cause. The money was used by the Roy's for a converted van capable of transporting their injured son.

Wouldn't it be terrific if a similar fundraiser took place at the Mullins Center later on this season during a UMass home game? Perhaps even a "Travis Roy Night?" A few words by you during halftime might motivate the UMass faithful to dig deep into their wallets to help out this collegiate athlete down on his luck.

You are the head coach of the #1 team in the nation and a fine orator. You are in a position to help Travis Roy. We will organize the fundraiser, find volunteers etc.... However, we cannot succeed without your assistance! Are you willing to help us, or do we leave these efforts to hockey fans from Texas?

We would like to meet with you to further discuss this matter. Your involvement will be greatly appreciated. Please contact us at your earliest convenience. We can be reached through the Collegian.

Ibish's column is inaccurate

To the Editor:

Can one person's hatred and anger be unleashed any more harshly than that of Hussein Ibish, in his Feb. 7 editorial,"U.S. recolonizes the Middle East?"

Since the tragic death of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, America has devoted itself towards achieving a comprehensive peace with all of the members of the Mediterranean region. A few years ago, peace seemed hopeless but thanks to the efforts of America, Israel and the countries within the region encompassing Jordan, Egypt peace is once again within grasps.

Ibish explicitly describes the entire U.S. military inhabitance within this region. What he neglects to discuss is the military capabilities of Iran and Iraq, and how these two countries are developing nuclear, biological and chemical weapons.

He also discusses how since the end of the gulf war, Arabs have been tortured by the Israelis and the Turks and other neighbors in the vicinity. Yet he fails to discuss is the amount of torture and fatalities that occur within Iran and Iraq every year. Saddam Hussein the leader of the Iraqi regime, has developed horrific biological and chemical weapons and invasion on an Arab sovereign country. These are actions of a ruthless dictator whose main concerns focus on himself and his quest to take over the entire Mediterranean region.

If there is a resurgence of colonialism within this region, it will be a direct result of Iran and Iraq's discontent with these countries who are committed to peace. Thanks to these countries, Yitzhak Rabin's dream of peace in the Middle East will ultimately become a reality.

Folk dancers featured as FAC hosts Cubans

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

In a rare performance, The Cuban National Folkloric Dance Ensemble will perform tonight at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. The performance, which begins at 8 p.m., will mark the return of the ensemble to American stages after a 15-year absence.

Founded in 1962 by Rogelio Martinez Fure, the Cuban National Folkloric Dance Ensemble is the leader in Afro–Cuban music and dance traditions and is celebrated as one of the most prestigious folkloric dance companies. The company consists of 40 musicians and dancers under the choreographic genius of one of Cuba's leading choreographers, Manolo Micler.

The company has carefully collected, preserved and revived the wealth of Cuba's diverse cultural traditions. This extraordinary legacy includes influences from the indigenous Caribbean and Europe (Spanish and French), as well as Africa (Yoruba, Congo, Carabali and Arara). This performance will reflect that diversity as the company performs dances dedicated to the Orishas (deities) of the Afro–Cuban Santaria religion along with country dances, rumbas, guajiras and the usual favorites like the cha-cha and the mambo.

One of the programs, Country Dances, is a tribute to the dances that grew out of the guateques or parties that Cuban peasants have celebrated since the beginning of the 19th century. The dances, such as the zapateo, dona juquina and la caringa, helped the peasants endure the hard living conditions of the times and express a seductive playfulness.

The soncitos and rumbitas guajiras are characterized by a blend of Spanish guitar and African rhythms. Sones celebrates the deep–rooted forms of Cuban musical tradition and is found in the central region of the island. The Baskets Dance is dedicated to O-shun, the owner of rivers and the goddess of beauty and flirtation. Yemaya is a ritual dance to the goddess of the seas and mother of all Orishas (the gods of the Santaria religion).

The dances represent the undulating movements of the sea. Ogun is a dance glorifying the power and the violent nature of Ogun, the lord of metals, the forge and war. Apalencedo is inspired by the struggle of the cimmarrunes, or forefathers, who fled captivity and hid in the wilderness in search of freedom. The songs and dances are of ancient arara and conga in origin and call out the eternal spirit of rebellion and industriousness of the masses.

Tickets for this performance are $25, $18, $13 and $10 for children age 17 and under. Five College student tickets are $5. For more information, please call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

String quartet set to perform at Bowker

World famous group to explore the magic and mystery in Mozart and Stravinsky

COURTESY CHRISTIAN STEINE

The famous Guarneri Quartet performs at Bowker Auditorium Sunday night.

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The Guarneri String Quartet, acclaimed by Newsweek as "one of the world's most elegant chamber ensembles" will perform Sunday night at Bowker Auditorium. The 7 p.m. performance will include Mozart's "Quartet in D Major, K.499," Stravinsky's "Concertino" and Turina's "La Oracion del Torero."

Celebrating their 31st anniversary together, the Guarneri String Quartet is made up of the perfect combination of violinists Arnold Steinhardt and John Dalley, violist Michael Tree and cellist David Soyer.

Steinhardt described the creative process of the ensemble, saying that "There will be hours and hours of brute labor involved in the technical problems of intonation, ensemble and the critical shadings of four like-sounding instruments. More important will be the unchartered process in which four people let their individual personalities shine while finding a unified quartet voice. There will be endless musings, discussions and criticisms that will finally end up as interpretation— that almost mystical amalgam of the four players that hovers somewhere in between their music stands."

That mysticism has been noted by others as well. The Los Angeles Times, in a review of an all-Beethoven recital, said, "Beethoven was more than well-served. He was revitalized by playing that probed into dark corners and illuminated mysteries. It was the sort of thing that can occur at any time but that rarely happens. It cannot be ordered or commanded; hard work can hasten its advent, but cannot guarantee its presence. It seemingly has to come from some other worldly source. Whatever its origins it had the Guarneri players firmly under its spell. They looked like hard-working musicians, but they played like angels."

The Quartet has been featured on many television and radio shows. It has also been the subjects of various films and books. The Quartet tours extensively with well over 3000 recitals a year. In addition to their regular schedule, they perform annual series at both the Lincoln Center and the Metropolitan Museum of Art. In 1992, the Guarneri String Quartet became the only quartet to receive the prestigious Award of Merit from the Association of Performing Arts Presenters.

Tickets for the concert are $25, $18 and $10 for children age 17 and under. Five College student tickets are $5. For information and tickets, call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

New album emotional & real

Aimee Mann's latest displays her talents at songwriting

COURTESY KATE GARNER

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

I'M WITH STUPID
Aimee Mann
Geffen Records

Aimee Mann has two of the most powerful weapons in songwriting.

The first is a talent for writing simple songs that carry complex emotions, something that she has displayed constantly from the moment she broke into music scene with 'Til Tuesday.

The second is something that hinted at being present on her first solo release, 1993's Whatever, but for the most part had to be read from off-stage while frustration over relationships basked in the spotlight — anger.

On her second effort, I'm With Stupid, Mann seems to have more to be angry about, and with good reason. As she has relayed in countless interviews lately, in the years following 'Til Tuesday's success, Mann has had countless problems with the record industry. Fighting to get her idea of a good song to the masses, being released from her contract, moving to a smaller label (Imago) and releasing a critically acclaimed and mildly successful solo album only to see the label go under has given her plenty of fuel for the fire.

I'm With Stupid favors sparser instrumentation than Whatever, but finds Mann breaking out the electric guitar and cranking up the distortion more often on songs like "Long Shot," "Choice in the Matter" and "Sugarcoated." The later featuring lyrics like "And out of your mouth/ comes a stream of cliches/ now I have given you so much rope/ you should have been hanging for days," the tones of which are the rule rather than the exception throughout the album.

Hints of the more minimalistic ballads that were prevalent on Whatever rear their heads on cuts like "Amateur," "You Could Make a Killing" and "Ray," getting back to acoustic guitar and piano.

However no matter what instrumentation she chooses and despite the use of the f-word on several instances, the bottom line has remained the same — memorable songs with real emotions.

And real is important today. In a music industry touting anyone who shrieks and screams about men as a "spokesperson" and someone with an "honest message," Mann has proved that you don't have to scream a lot to be taken seriously, if the emotion is really there and not contrived, the people having the finger pointed at them will get the message. A

Blues tradition highlighted in concert

By Ian Simons
Collegian Correspondent

CAROLINA SLIM
Augusta Savage Gallery
Feb. 7

The blues must be considered one of America's most important musical contributions to the twentieth century. Crossing racial barriers and class boundaries, it has become a truly international music, opening up artistic avenues for blacks and whites, young and old. On Wednesday evening, the Augusta Savage Gallery in New Africa House witnessed a performance of this universal American cultural expression, a tradition known as the blues legend.

The 69-year-old Carolina Slim, a.k.a. Elijah Staley, played alongside a younger blues guitarist, 18-year-old Jeremiah. The duo, who have been together for roughly four years, played songs "as old as the hills," as Carolina Slim put it, reflecting the world from which the blues originated and the pain suffered when one loses a woman's love.

The overflowing Augusta Savage Gallery was treated to some "good, truthful, soulful" music according to Slim, including a slightly alternative version of "Old McDonald" which was played for the younger members of the audience because he likes "to see 'em blush." Indeed, throughout the evening both demonstrated an innovative and creative approach to the music which was thoroughly appreciated by the receptive and diverse audience.

With a warm little chuckle after each song, Slim often went on to make small-talk, offer advice or tell a brief tale in his easy-going manner about a show or appearance in a nightclub in New York City (where he presently lives). And having recommended the audience "be cool, take it easy ... and bleed slowly," he would lay down another timeless rhythm and soulfully sing in his honest, "telling-it-like-it-is" voice about some home truths.

Finishing with a song from his latest album, "Peace of Mind," the pair answered questions from the audience in an informal and friendly manner. Blues is clearly alive and well, and it probably always will be, as this show clearly demonstrated.

Coolio to play Springfield on Sunday

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

The scene was all too familiar. Driving through any city or town this summer you were sure to hear someone blasting "Gangsta's Paradise," Coolio's mega-summer hit.

Released on the Dangerous Minds soundtrack, "Gangsta's Paradise" soared to #1 in the charts while the soundtrack sold over 1.5 million copies. Coolio was the man.

He still is. Just last week he came home with a not too prized, but impressive nonetheless, American Music Award for Best Rap Artist. In 1995 he was the heart and soul of hip hop but he is hardly a new kid on the block.

Artis Ivey (Coolio's birth name) was born 32 years ago in South Central, Los Angeles. He first started rapping in the late 1970's when rap was still inventing itself. He spent the last decade in numerous bands such as NuSkool, Low Profile and WC & the MADD Circle gaining a loyal following but little money.

In the early 1990's Coolio was forced to go on welfare, an event he hasn't forgotten. Fortunately, he linked up with the hip Tommy Boy label who signed him as a solo artist. Both solo albums, It Takes A Thief and Gangsta's Paradise, have put Coolio in the forefront of the rap world.

Though Washington politicians may fear Coolio's image more than a balanced budget, the man behind "Gangsta's Paradise" isn't your typical gangsta rapper. Coolio realizes as the voice of a silent generation he has the power to make a difference, which may be why his lyrics have taken a marked turn from his South Central peers.

On "Is This Me" Coolio raps, "I've got bills to pay and kids to raise / And a whole generation of lost niggas to save."

Coolio has also become actively involved in AIDS awareness recently appearing at International AIDS Day. He preaches in his song, "Too Hot," "We gotta do something drastic / Shit is getting is getting tragic / And if you don't believe me then go ask Magic."

Not since Public Enemy has an artist like Coolio been able to break down both lyrical and musical boundaries that clearly set him apart from his peers. Hopefully in concert he will be as impressive.

Coolio appears at Razzi's in Springfield with PRS-7. Sunday night at 8 p.m. The show is 18+. Tickets are $18.50 in advance from the Northampton Box Office and Strawberries. For more information call 732-8181.

Men's track tunes up for Atlantic–10s

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

"This is one of those meets where the teams start to go all out for the first time," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien of the St. Valentine's Day Invitational at the Boston University track tomorrow at noon.

The Minutemen will send their best performers up against some of the top track athletes in the country from big–time college athletic conferences like the SEC, the Big–10, the Pac–10 and the Big East.

O'Brien has entered 21 athletes in 12 separate events highlighted by the combination of a healthy Scott Price and freshman star Tom Toye in the 200–meter race. Ron Tauro will get a break this weekend running in just his primary event: the high hurdles.

"We've used Ronny up pretty solidly over the course of the last three weekends," O'Brien said. "So, this will allow him to concentrate on the hurdles... this will physically and mentally rest him for the A–10 meet."

Six of the aforementioned 21 Minutemen are freshman. Along with Toye in the 200 and 4x400–meter relay, Neil Concepcion will compete in the 400, Jan Stevens in the shot put, Andre Roach is entered in the triple jump, Alberto Vasquez in the pole vault and Matt Ely in the distance relay.

"So far, each of the firsts [the freshmen] have [encountered], whether it be their first dual meet or the Challenge Cup finals, they've performed to my maximum expectations," O'Brien said.

"I don't anticipate any differences [at this meet]; certainly they'll be more excited, but I don't think that will cause anything other than a positive performance."

A positive performance is all coach O'Brien will be looking for at this meet as (at least out of the corner of their collective eyes) the UMass track team will be looking ahead to the Atlantic 10 Championship meet on Feb. 17 at Mackal Field House on the Rhode Island campus.

This meet is on a purely competitive basis. No points will be awarded, and no single team will be considered a winner. This meet is just Tom Toye against Michigan's best sprinter and Mark Lefebvre against UCLA's best thrower.

One Massachusetts runner who was left off the travel list was Paul Blodorn, the squad's fourth leading scorer. The junior from Sag Harbor, N.Y. will stay in town and prepare himself for the A–10 meet.

Mike Tessicini, who has scored just five points on the season, will continue to recover from a pulled hamstring and will try to be ready for the A–10 meet as well.

Besides leaving Blodorn and Tessicini in Amherst for the weekend, O'Brien has made a couple of changes in the relay teams.

The team of Dave Cahill, Nathan Goard, Price and Concepcion in the 4x400 relay scored a season best time of 3:25.22 at the Challenge Cup finals, but Cahill and Goard will be replaced by Toye and Chris Conner with whom the relay has been run in 3:20.5.

Sophomore Michael Marchand will be the only runner staying on the distance relay team. Ely, Cahill and Mike Ferrari will be running in place of Concepcion, Jon Way and Patrick Murphy. The former foursome running the relay a good 50 seconds faster than the latter.

UMass looking for quality performances

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team travels to Boston University this weekend for the St. Valentine's Day Invitational, the focus for the Minutewomen will be on quality — not quantity.

With the daunting championship stretch of its season just around the corner, the UMass squad will look to hone in on top–notch performances.

The Valentine's Invitational is one of the largest and toughest meets of the season. The meet is a proving ground for athletes interested in qualifying for regional and national meets.

"This is a huge invitational," Massachusetts coach Julie LaFreniere said. "It is big in the sense that there are a lot of teams interested, but it is not an open, all–comers meet."

The Minutewomen will send fewer than half of their runners, in an attempt to allow certain runners to specialize and concentrate on one or two events.

"This meet gives us a chance to let some of the athletes specialize," LaFreniere said. "With only half of the team going to the meet, a lot of runners will get some much– needed rest. And the others will get the chance to focus.

"For the past several meets we have had women tripling up on events, and that isn't going to happen at this meet."

There will be only one hurdler for Massachusetts as Anya Forrest will try to break her new school record for the 55– meter hurdles. Forrest ran a time of 8.15 seconds last week at the Syracuse Invitational to claim the top spot in the UMass record books for that event.

Rosey Bryan and Emma Gardiner will compete in both the 55–meter dash and the 200–meter dash, joining that duo in the 200 will be Yves Amazan, Nicole Roberts, Melanie Bell and Shelanda Irish. Roberts, Michelle Cooper and Silifa Kenku are slated to race in the 400.

Five runners will compete in the 3,000m distance event. Rebecca Donaghue, Jen Waeger, Kristin Donaldson, Katie Greenia, Christy Martin and Melissa Langevin are all scheduled. Donaghue will look to better her 9:54.47 time from last week, which put her fourth on the school's all–time list.

"I expect some really fast times from all of my runners," LaFreniere said. "This is a very fast track, and we have the potential to cut some times by large margins.

"Anya and Rebecca are two people I would like to see really improve. Anya ran a 8.15 last weekend. I think she might be able to run an 8.10. Rebecca I would like to see run in the 9:40s. She has only run this event once, and I think she can really improve."

UMass will also send three athletes to the field event competition. Christy Martin, Shana Mitchell and Stephanie Townson will all throw in the 20–pound weight throw. Martin will also take part in the shot put.

"This is a very fast meet," LaFreniere said. "The last time I called to see who was competing there were eight women slated for the mile, who run sub 4:40.

"We are looking to the Atlantic 10s and this is a great tune–up for that. If all goes well, I think we may have a shot at A–10s."

Magic says return is for his son's smile

By John Nadel
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Magic Johnson says just seeing the smile of his 3–year–old son has made his comeback worthwhile.

And, Johnson said Thursday in a telephone interview with The Associated Press, his return from retirement has been all he could have imagined, and more.

"Oh, boy, I tell you, now that's all he talks about," Johnson said of his son, Earvin "EJ" III. "Last night, he had to go to a dinner with my wife, so when we got home, he was saying, 'Daddy, I just saw you on TV playing basketball.'"

Johnson had 18 points, nine rebounds and eight assists Wednesday night to lead the Los Angeles Lakers to a 106–96 victory over the New Jersey Nets.

The Lakers are 4–1 since Johnson began his comeback last week. At the time he announced he was returning to the court, Johnson said one of the reasons was so his young son and daughter could watch him play in the NBA.

Johnson, averaging 17.8 points, 7.2 rebounds and 7.8 assists, made the game's biggest shot — a three–pointer as the 24–second clock expired with 1:20 remaining — to extend his team's lead from four points to seven.

"It's so exciting to see him so excited," Johnson said of his son. "He remembers everything at the game. It's great. It's all been worth it, coming back, to see the smile on his face."

Johnson said his son's pre–school cut out a picture of the boy in a local newspaper the day after Johnson's first game back and put it on the bulletin board. That gave Earvin III another thrill.

Johnson retired suddenly on Nov. 7, 1991, after learning he had contracted the virus that causes AIDS. He had led the Lakers to the NBA Finals nine times and to five league championships in 12 years. In the ensuing four and a half years, he thought about returning to the court several times.

Finally, on Jan. 29, he did so and on the following night, played in the first NBA game that counted since June 12, 1991.

"The fun I've had, the excitement, it's been more than I ever imagined," Johnson said. "I guess that the fans of the town, the country, and the world, are giving back to me."

Johnson, 36, said he's received bins of mail from throughout the world since coming back.

"I can't answer all of them, it's been over 30,000," he said. "They're still coming in. It's been the wildest thing I've ever seen, without a doubt.

"They're just saying how happy they are to see me out there. It's cute how they send it in their writing, 'Welcome back.' I'm getting a lot of them from schools. A lot of them are saying, 'I stopped watching basketball and now I'm back watching,' and 'I cried when you retired and I cried when you came back.'

"A lot of people are saying that when I started playing basketball (again), they started watching for the first time. I'm getting it all, most of it involves, 'Welcome back,' 'We were Laker fans,' something of that nature."

Johnson spoke from the office of his agent, Lon Rosen, who recalled a conversation with his 4 1/2–year–old son, Brian, the morning after the first game of Johnson's comeback.

"The television was on and it showed highlights of the game," Rosen said. "Brian saw them and asked me, 'Dad, what's EJ's daddy doing playing for the Lakers?'"

Defense helps UM pull out victory

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Consistency is the name of the game when it comes to the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

When the team shows up to the game focused and ready to play, they walk home with 30–point blow–outs, like last weekend's annihilation of Fordham. When they sit back and lean on senior co–captains Melissa Gurile and Octavia Thomas to pick up the slack, they fall.

Although the Minutewomen left the Mullins Center on the good side of a 78–51 dismantling of the Temple Owls (4–17, 1–10 in the Atlantic 10), things were sticky in the first half.

The opening stanza started out slow for UMass as it fought back with an 11–0 run to take a 32–27 half–time lead. It was evident that the first quarter of the game was not filled with Minutewomen intensity. What turned the game around was the squad's high–intensity defense and some key "step up" performances from the bench.

UMass has the ability to go 10 deep, when the Minutewomen sub in five players at a time, they have a decisive edge over teams with less depth. Such was the case with Temple.

"We had a lot of people play in the first half," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said. "We stayed fairly fresh and I think they were running a little bit ragged those last three minutes, where our girls had a little more juice left in them."

This offensive juice saw four Minutewomen post double figures in the evening's scoring column. Thomas led the way with 16 points as Gurile, Beth Kuzmeski and Jaywana Bradley scored 14, 13 and 12 points, respectively. Kuzmeski led the way in the accuracy department going 3–for–4 from outside the arc.

What is even better for UMass is the impressive play from the bench, as was seen in the Fordham blow–out.

"Right now we're at a point where the young kids have stepped up and have started to learn the system," O'Brien said.

From Bradley's perspective, she saw it as something that she naturally had to do. Adding that it was her team, and season veterans like Thomas who made her feel comfortable, playing a big game was made that much easier

"When I first walked onto the court, Octavia came to me and she told me to play my game the way I am capable of playing," Bradley said. "That really motivated me to go out there and do the best that I can."

Thomas, once again, provided much more than encouragement to the Minutewomen's game as she was responsible for another key spark in the first half. With 7:06 remaining in the half, Thomas pulled down the 832nd rebound of her career, placing her at the top of UMass' all– time career rebounding list.

"It shows that I've worked hard for four years. I just chase the ball down," Thomas said of her new spot in the record books.

O'Brien put things in perspective contributing Thomas' success to her hustle and work ethic.

"I think the amazing thing about that is she's able to do that at 5–foot–9," O'Brien said. "I imagine if you go back and look at most of the rebounders and you're probably looking at a lot of centers and power forwards."

Before UMass could get the offense rolling, it was its defensive game which provided its second half heroics, leading up to the 27–point win.

"Obviously I was pretty pleased with the defensive effort," O'Brien said. "When you hold a team to 51 points, I don't care who you're playing, that's pretty good."

The Minutewomen now look to Saturday's game against Xavier in the Mullins Center. With UMass' win two, lose one, curse hanging over its heads, its nine–game home win streak is on the line.

Temple 25– 15 in the final 20 minutes. Gurile led all players with 10 rebounds.

The Minutewomen look to buck the trend of losing after winning two straight when they put their nine–game home winning streak on the line against Xavier, Saturday at noon.

Minutewomen Milestone: In the win, UMass forward Octavia Thomas grabbed her 832nd career rebound, pushing her past Julie Ready as the all–time leader on the Minutewomen record books.

"It's a nice feeling," the senior forward said of her achievement. "I work hard chasing down those balls. It's been four years of hard work."

"To do that at 5–foot–9 is incredible," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "Normally you see that from a center or power forward. To do what she did is remarkable."

JAMY REILLY / COLLEGIAN

Tricia Hopson [12] put in a solid 21 minutes off the bench for UMass scoring six points, dishing out five assists and coming up with a team–high four steals.

Highlights...

The Minutewomen struggled at the start of this contest but used an 11–0 run to take a five–point halftime lead... Thomas became UMass' all–time leader in career rebounds as she pulled down the 832nd board of her career midway through the first half... Freshman Jaywana Bradley stepped up with a career–high performance after getting her first career start. She finished with 12 points on 6–of–7 shooting while also grabbing three rebounds... Gurile recorded a double–double (14 points, 10 boards).

(the second coming of Mike Moffat?) and Alexi Kasatonov to the Baby B's, while calling up Tim Sweeney, Clayton Beddoes, John Gruden, Scott Bailey and Andre Roy.

So now we have Ranford in net, whom I admit is a solid goaltender, but when you give up odd–man rushes regularly, you're going to lose more hockey games than you win.

Granted Ranford stonewalled opponents, namely the Bruins, to lead the Oilers to a Stanley Cup in 1990 but he needs help in front of him. The Bruins have given up 26 goals in the final two minutes of a period. The top two threats to score on the Boston netminder aren't snipers from the opposition but their own defensemen Jon Rohloff and Rick Zombo. Though better of late, improvement is still needed with them.

Let's face it, overall the players needed to be close to the top of the league. Sinden has put in Black and Gold, and Steve Kasper doesn't have the slightest clue how to make them work together. At first I applauded the new coach, now I want his head to roll. He did an excellent job making guys with limited talent believe they could win last year in Providence. The Big club needs more Kasper does little to motivate his stars and can stand pat on anything.

Since Ranford's arrival the Bruins are 4–5–1 and don't have the least bit of chemistry. That's because Kasper's lines seem to be on an egg–timer. If someone has a bad shift, he thinks, 'Gotta have a line change."

McEachern, who was the Bruins saving grace early in the season, had been delegated to a fourth line until the recent rash of injuries. When Mullen and Teschet return from what ails them, why not pair them on a second line with Jozef Stumpel? Then McEachern can join Dave Reid and Ted Donato, and add more speed plus another scorer to the checking line.

They could have been a cup contender, but now they look more like those "Forever 500's," (gulp) — the Hartford Whalers, and could be kept out of the playoffs by Tampa Bay.

Tommy McVie, I miss you more than ever.

• In an attempt to cut payroll, the Winnipeg Jets traded Teemu Selanne and his nearly $25 million salary to Anaheim for the Ducks last two first round draft picks, Oleg Tresvordosky and Chad Kilger. The two are decent prospects, especially the 21–year old Russian defenseman Trevordosky But I'd bet Phoenix fans would have accepted hockey a lot easier into the desert with the Finnish Flash coming to town. I find it hard to believe Jerry Colangelo didn't want Selanne on his team, now it's simply the Alexi Zhamnov–Keith Tkachuk show

• In the "I don't start the rumor but if I can't believe it I'll pass it on for a good laugh" category, the hottest new couple in the sports world is... ESPN's Keith Olberman and 1995 Women's Athlete of the Year Rebecca Lobo.

Remember it's just a rumor.

• Who would of thought that after 22 games the biggest run made against the UMass men's basketball team would have been by Fordham, 17–0?

• Interleague play in baseball. What a great idea and what a lousy idea wrapped up into one controversial package. The purists have a big problem with it because it takes away from the mystique and intrigue of two teams who haven't seen each other or really scouted them at all, facing off in the World Series.

The debating of how the teams would match up leading to the event was an endless source of conversation. Last year how often did you argue how the stacked top–to–bottom lineup of the Cleveland Indians would do against the dream rotation of the Atlanta Braves?

Granted I think Mets/Yankees, Braves/Red Sox and Reds/Indians series will draw more fans to the ballpark because of natural rivalries that will develop, but I don't see Twins fans beating the doors of the Metrodome down like the late 80's when the Pittsburgh Pirates travel to Minnesota next season.

• The Indy Racing League kicked off a couple of weeks ago in Disney World. How appropriate, the league will most likely incur the same fate as other famous second comings such as the USFL and EuroDisney have suffered from — a short existence.

between UMass and UMass–Lowell. Each team won a game on the other's home ice earlier this season.

There is no love lost between the two teams, the rivalry becoming even more intense as the Tully Forum staff mocked "UMass–Amherst" during introductions before a game earlier this season. The Minutemen retaliated by opening up a 5–0 lead and cruised to a 7–4 victory.

Martin Fillion has been a mainstay in the River Hawk net, starting every game but one since that Nov 11 encounter with the Minutemen.

Forward Brendan Concannon has at least one point in each of the past 17 games, scoring 26 points in all, while leading a powerful top line Concannon's 37 points equals him with Christian Sbrocca for the team lead, while Jeff Daw is close behind with 35.

This is a pivotal series for UMass which must start to gain ground on New Hampshire if it intends to finish above eighth in the league. Finishing in that spot will likely send the Minutemen to BU for the first round of the playoffs, not the easiest road to the Hockey East semifinals for sure rock," Purnell said. "He always took care of his academic responsibilities. He was just a good person."

Penny Smith, an athletic department spokeswoman, said none of the players would be available to comment.

"The University of Dayton community is stunned and deeply saddened by the death of Chris Daniels," athletic director Ted Kissell said. "Our prayers are with his family, friends and with the Dayton Flyers team and coaches."

The Flyers' Atlantic 10 Conference game with La Salle that had been scheduled for Thursday night was postponed.

Daniels was averaging 12.9 points and 6 rebounds a game for the Flyers (11–10).

He earned a degree in communications management in April and was pursuing a second degree in sociology.

Daniels missed his sophomore season (1992–93) when he tore a ligament of his right knee during a pickup game. He bounced back the following season, scoring a career–high 21 points against Western Illinois.

Tony Bisutti, who coached Daniels at DeSales High School in Columbus, said Daniels grew from a shy high school student to an outgoing adult.

Vaughn, Red Sox still can't agree on deal

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Red Sox general manager Dan Duquette said Thursday he still thinks the team can work out a long–term deal with AL most valuable player Mo Vaughn before the Feb. 19 arbitration hearing.

"We've made a substantial offer," Duquette said. "A deal of this magnitude takes time."

Vaughn, perhaps the most popular athlete in Boston, hit .300 with 39 homers and 126 RBIs last year. He is seeking a three–to–five–year deal at an average of about $6.5 million, while the team is offering about $5.6 million per year.

If no deal is reached, an arbitrator will decide whether the first baseman should make the $6.1 million he requested or the club's submitted offer of $4.2 million.

Vaughn has grown frustrated with the pace of the talks and said that if he cannot sign a long–term deal before his arbitration hearing he will test the market when he becomes a free agent after the 1997 season.

Vaughn's agent, Tom Reich, was quoted in Thursday's editions of the Boston Herald as saying that the frustration had progressed.

"Our long–term proposals have been taken off the table by us. Maybe the talks will be held again another day. But if and when they are, Mo will be calling the shots then," Reich told the paper.

"These talks have been going on for a year and a half. We will not spin our wheels anymore."

Duquette downplayed the agent's comments.

"If we can't get a long–term deal now, we'll try later," he said.

Duquette said he wants Vaughn to get involved in the talks, instead of letting his agents handle it.

"I think it's healthy for a player to hear the club's perspective," he said.

Reich said Vaughn will issue a statement by the end of the week and won't discuss the negotiations once spring training begins so his performance won't be affected.

Duquette said that was not a concern.

"Mo's a real professional guy," he said.

Duquette also said he met with shortstop John Valentin on Thursday in an attempt to avoid arbitration. Also Thursday, the Red Sox signed infielder Wil Cordero for 1997 with an option for 1998. Cordero, acquired from Montreal last month, had previously agreed to a 1996 deal worth $1.85 million. He will make $3 million in 1997 and, if his option is picked up, $3.5 million in 1998.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
by Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — Adjusting to change is necessary, but you are able to take a new venture in stride. Pay close attention to legal and partnership matters. Refuse to let a romantic relationship fall into a rut.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — Someone thinks you are special and lets you know it. An invitation to a glittering affair will make your day. Greater financial security is vital to your peace of mind.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Trust your instincts. Your ability to foresee trends gives you the edge over competitors. Join a fun loving group this evening and kick up your heels.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Keep your long range goals in mind when dealing with difficult people. Try not to get locked in a power struggle or stand-off with a business associate. Use your energy to create joy.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Close friends are depending on you. Be helpful, but draw the line where your savings are involved. Domestic matters require more attention than usual. Put first things first.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Diplomacy will win you important support from your co-workers today. Getting a salary increase may not be as difficult as you imagined. Confidential information could be revealed.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Your intuition is uncanny now. You find the perfect solution to an [illegible] situation. Attend to [illegible] and accounting matters. Romance is highlighted late in the day.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — Sharing your experiences with a sympathetic listener could lead to a long-lasting alliance. Get everything in writing if you decide to go into business together.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — An influential person cracks the whip, setting a burdensome agenda. Putting in overtime may be necessary. If things get too difficult, think about seeking employment elsewhere. A fun evening with friends revitalizes you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — Financial matters deserve prompt attention today. You may be able to add to your income with a creative venture that has shown real potential. Competition for a top spot is keen. Do your best!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — A relationship should be on firmer ground now. You give serious consideration to entering into a permanent alliance. It is once a time to think. Your wit and charm make you a popular guest. Seek inexpensive entertainment tonight.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Creative endeavors are favored. Showcasing your talents will make others aware of your true potential. Your rapport with influential people is an asset. Pursue a goal with zeal. You have what it takes to succeed!

Massachusetts tries to drub Temple again Sunday

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday the Massachusetts men's basketball team went into McGonigle Hall and embarrassed John Chaney's Temple Owls, holding them to the lowest scoring output since the inception of the shot clock.

The Minutemen (22-0, 9-0 in the Atlantic 10) have also had a tough time of it since the Feb. 1 clash, though still remaining undefeated. Xavier and Fordham both gave UMass scares, but the Minutemen prevailed on both occasions.

After being away from Amherst for more than a week, the Minutemen return to the William D. Mullins Center Sunday at 1:30 p.m. for their second tilt with arch-rival Temple this season. The three-game road trip left the team tired and in need of some home-cooking in order to refuel for what will be a game of pride for the Owls.

If Temple (11-9 overall, 7-2) hopes to improve on the 24-point loss, it must find someone other than Marc Jackson to hit shots from the field. The center hit six of his team's 13 field goals and only Derrick Battie hit more than one.

Jackson has been the go-to-man for the Owls all season and leads the team with 17 points per A-10 contest. In his first meeting with national player of the year candidate Marcus Camby, Jackson attempted to draw the big man into foul trouble but was unsuccessful. Camby picked up only three fouls, the last with 10 minutes remaining in the game.

The 6-foot-10-inch 270-pound center needs fellow sophomore Johnny Miller to step up his long-range bombing. Miller has averaged only four points a game since his return form a shoulder injury.

Outside shooting has been the biggest problem for Temple in recent games. From behind the three-point arc, the Owls are a collective 2-for-43 — an abysmal 4.5 percent. Overall this season Temple shoots 27.5 percent form three-point land.

The 59-35 destruction by UMass was the first conference loss for Temple, who then went to D. C. and lost to George Washington, 64-47. It was the Owls first loss in their last 14 games at the Smith Center. The Owls hosted the St. Joseph's Hawks last night but results were not available as of press time.

It's been the bench that has come up with quality minutes in the Minutemen's two games against Xavier and Fordham, as Tyrone Weeks and Charlton Clarke have begun to contribute off the pine. Weeks grabbed a career-high 13 boards against Xavier and followed that up with seven rebounds against Fordham. He has also averaged 8.5 points in those two games.

Clarke has started to find his range after going three games without a field goal, as he has scored in his last three games. More importantly from his coach's standpoint, his defensive pressure has improved since recovering from a broken bone in his foot.

After stepping on a Xavier player's ankle last Sunday, Camby said he wasn't suffering at all from the injury, although the area was just a bit sore. Donta Bright and Edgar Padilla, who both had stinging injuries in the Fordham game, are showing no effects of injury.

Broadcast Notes: The UMass/Temple game will be broadcast live on WMUA 91.1 with play-by-play by Brian Perillo and Dan "The Walrus" Welch on color analysis. Pre-game begins at 1:15 p.m.

Minutewomen drill Temple

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Entering last night women's basketball game between Massachusetts (13-7 overall, 3-4 in the Atlantic 10) and Temple (14-16, 1-9) the Minutewomen had developed a trend of winning two games after a loss.

This was the second game after UMass' loss at George Washington a week ago and the Owls were the team to help keep that streak intact.

See related story 9

Though the usual A-10 doormats hung around in the first half and led by as many as seven, the Minutewomen turned up their team speed and ran wild in the final 23 minutes to win going away, 78-51.

UMass trailed 27-21 with just over three minutes remaining in the first half, then clamped down on defense, running off the last 11 points of the half heading to the locker room up by five. That spurt was led by Octavia Thomas, who had five of the 11 points, as she drove the lane on repeated possessions for easy lay-ups.

After the Owls opened the second half with four straight points to close the margin to 32-31, the Minutemen went on a 30-9 run to put the game well out of reach. It was the team speed of UMass and making the extra pass that opened the game up for coach Joanie O'Brien.

"We started to settle down and play our game," O'Brien said. "Our players really started to step up the intensity and they decided to get up and down the floor. We got easy shots out of it."

Several spectacular passes were made by Minutewomen for easy lay-ins, the most dazzling of which was Jaswana Bradley's pass while sitting on the floor to Lucia Madajova and Crystal Carroll's over the top lob to Melissa Gurile. Junior Sahriya Mitchell led the Minutewomen with seven assists.

Bench depth was also a key factor for the Minutewomen last night as O'Brien used many different combinations to keep her players well rested.

"When Joanie subbed all five of her players," Temple coach Kristen Foley said, "I was worried because we can't do that. But she can do that because she has so many weapons and that was a determining factor. Usually we do sub more but the starters had to play a lot of minutes [last night]."

Bradley, a freshman, made her first ever start for the Minutewomen and was impressive, recording a season and career-high with 12 points hitting 6-of-7 shots from the field.

Beth Kuzmeski found the touch from outside last night hitting 3-of-4 from downtown and her all-around effort was applauded by her coach.

"Beth played really well and fought hard," O'Brien said. "It was a real physical game and she got her head handed to her on a screen but still hit good open shots."

Temple was able to stay close in the early going with its pressure defense and tenacious play on the offensive boards. In the first 20 minutes, UMass committed 14 turnovers and gave the Owls nine offensive rebounds. Both teams hit 15 baskets from the floor in the half but the Owls had nine more shots to get them.

The Minutewomen turned that figure around in the second half as they dominated the glass, outrebounding

Dayton center dies hours after workout

By James Hannah
Associated Press

DAYTON, Ohio — He practiced with the team Wednesday and later said he felt fine. Hours later, University of Dayton center Chris Daniels was dead.

Daniels, 22, was pronounced dead at Miami Valley Hospital at 5:31 a.m. He had arrived in "full cardiac arrest" after being rushed from his campus-area home in an ambulance and could not be resuscitated, said hospital spokeswoman Julie Weber.

Montgomery County Coroner James Davis said cause of death could not be determined from preliminary autopsy results. He said no drugs or alcohol were in Daniels' system.

Dayton coach Oliver Purnell said Thursday he talked to Daniels on Wednesday night to see if he felt well enough to play in Thursday night's game.

He did not play Tuesday night against Bethune-Cookman because the ankle he sprained in Saturday's game against St. Joseph's had been bothering him.

"He said, 'Hey coach I'm doing great. It's better today. And we'll see you tomorrow,'" Purnell said at a news conference. "For him to be standing there healthy and everything going well for him, and then to wake up to this this morning is difficult."

Davis said there was no evidence Daniels died of a stroke, a ruptured vessel in the brain or any effects from a cortisone shot he had taken for his sprained ankle.

Davis said Daniels had a slightly enlarged heart but that was not unusual for an athlete his size.

Daniels, a 6-foot-10, 238-pound fifth-year senior, was second in the nation in field goal percentage, hitting 67.9 percent of his shots.

"We're obviously grieving right now," Purnell said. "We're sort of leaning on each other to deal with this very difficult situation. Our guys are in shock. We've lost our quality guy, a guy who cared about people."

Purnell said he received a call early Thursday from Darnell Hoskins, a former Wisconsin player who transferred to Dayton, telling him Daniels had collapsed.

Purnell was an assistant coach at Maryland when Len Bias, who had just been drafted as the No. 2 overall pick in the first round by the NBA champion Boston Celtics, died from cocaine use. Bias collapsed in a dorm room during a party June 19, 1986.

Purnell said he never heard a negative comment about Daniels. "As a person, he was always solid as a

Big weekend against BU, Lowell

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team hates UMass-Lowell and the feeling is reportedly mutual. UMass also hates Boston University and the feelings there are similar.

This will be one fun weekend.

The Minutemen will travel to BU's Walter Brown Arena for a tilt with the No. 2 Terriers (20-3-3, 12-3-2 in Hockey East) tonight, and then return to the Mullins Center to face the 10th-ranked River Hawks (18-6-3, 12-5-1) tomorrow night at 8 p.m., the time change to accommodate a women's basketball game.

While UMass (10-15-1, 4-12-1) has already gained respect from many associated with Hockey East as the Minutemen continue their growing process, the team has yet to accomplish the league's ultimate regular season respect gainer.

Defeating BU at Walter Brown Arena.

UMass has dropped its three previous visits to Walter Brown Arena since the program's reinstatement and will look to take advantage of a Terrier team that is likely overlooking UMass on Friday night.

BU played clearly its biggest game of the season thus far on Monday night as the Terriers downed Comm. Ave. rival Boston College in the Beanpot 4-1. The Terriers will return to the FleetCenter Monday night to battle Northeastern for the title, and tonight's game with UMass (eighth in Hockey East) is not a priority for the confident team.

While BC openly talked after its Beanpot semifinal of its game tonight against Providence, and the Huskies did likewise of their tilt with Merrimack, BU players spoke only of the Beanpot, not of their game tonight, and had to be prodded to do so.

"We just have to take care of business on Friday night and get ready for the Beanpot on Monday," Terrier captain Jay Pandolfo said. "UMass always plays hard, it will be a hard fought game and hopefully we'll play well."

The Terriers will not be starting their No. 1 man between the pipes, saving Tom Noble for Monday's Beanpot final and starting freshman Michel Larocque instead. Larocque has been a capable backup though, posting an 8-1-1 record and a 3.69 goals-against-average.

UMass will likely counter with Brian Regan, who has been the team's top netminder recently. Regan has started the last five games for the Minutemen, and has played well through some tough losses.

One of college hockey's hottest teams will venture to Mullins tomorrow night, as the No. 10 UMass-Lowell River Hawks face the Minutemen. Lowell has won seven in a row and nine of its last 10, ascending to second place in the Hockey East standings.

The key pair of victories in this stretch coming at the expense of the then-No. 1 Terriers, whom the River Hawks swept in a home-and-home series, coming from behind in each contest. The sweep was especially surprising considering that BU was 34-2-3 all-time against Lowell entering the weekend.

At stake in this budding rivalry is the inaugural Alumni Cup to be given to the winner of the season series

Clinton angered by IRA attack Sat. in London

By Lawrence L. Knutson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With the Irish Republican Army claiming responsibility for the London bomb blast that shattered a 17-month cease-fire, President Clinton said Saturday that, "No one and no organization" has the right to destroy peace.

"This attack was aimed at the growing prospects for peace, a just and lasting peace, in Northern Ireland," the president said. He said he would do his best to make sure the search for peace goes forward.

"The people of Northern Ireland have chosen peace," Clinton said. "They do not deserve to have a small group choose bloodshed and violence and wreck the peaceful life they long for.

"No one and no organization has the right to deny the people of Northern Ireland a peaceful future, and I am determined to do all that I can to see that the enemies of peace do not succeed," he said.

The president commented on the South Lawn of the White House Saturday morning before departing on a campaign swing through Iowa. Later, in Iowa City, Clinton called the London bombing, "an act of venality and cowardice," a breaking of the peace against the wishes of citizens on both sides of the dispute.

Over the past 17 months Clinton has made the good offices of his government available to leaders of all sectarian factions in Northern Ireland in a strong effort to broker a peace settlement. Clinton appointed former Sen. George Mitchell (D-Maine) last year to head an international commission to examine obstacles to all-party talks. The commission recommended a two-track process in which talks would begin while both the IRA and Protestant militias began to disarm.

In acknowledging it was responsible for the explosion that killed at least two people and injured at least three dozen others, the IRA accused the British government of sabotaging the peace process by stalling on all-party negotiations.

But Clinton said the peace process had not come to a dead end and must continue.

He said he had assured British Prime Minister John Major and Irish Prime Minister John Bruton in telephone calls, "that America would continue to be committed to work for a negotiated, secure peace."

The bomb exploded Friday night in a parking garage, one hour after the unforeseen announcement that the IRA was cancelling the cease-fire to protest the slow pace of the peace process.

Students at the University of Massachusetts may end up with more than flowers and candy this Valentine's Day, as the Mather Career Center hosts its annual campus-wide Career Fair at the Campus Center this Wednesday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Over 150 firms and organizations are expected to be at the fair seeking graduating seniors for full-time permanent positions. The Co-op and Summer Job Fair, to be held the following day, will offer younger students the opportunity to gain valuable experience and skills, preparing them for the job market after graduation.

According to Tina Acker, the director of operations at Mather Career Center, the Career Fair is an informal way for students to start making contacts and to find out more about the jobs that are available to them.

"They will want resumes, but they don't need cover letters," Acker said. "However, somebody without a resume should feel comfortable to come down as well. Just because someone hasn't finished their resume yet, they shouldn't be held back from coming."

UMass Career Center director, Joan Stoia explained that the job market has improved since past years, and that graduates are looking for students who have well-rounded backgrounds.

"The job market is much better than last year, the year before last year, and five years before that. We've seen an ambitious, enthusiastic return of employers that we haven't seen in a long time because they simply weren't hiring," she said.

Stoia went on to highlight the importance of being a well-rounded student. She identified traits such as problem-solving abilities, writing skills, the ability to have effective interpersonal communication and an awareness of other cultures and cultural perspectives.

"What we're emphasizing a lot is community service. Most of these skills can be obtained through service," Stoia said. "People in the Greek system may get the skills through planning charity fundraisers. Organizations like VIBES and the Boltwood Project are a good place for building those skills."

According to Stoia, students don't need to be the presidents or leaders of these organizations to catch an employers eye.

"A lot of students don't know just how much they have to offer, even though employers can see it," Stoia said. "If students coming to the career fair can discuss these traits, 'critical competencies' as we call them, then they will probably make some very good contacts."

Stoia also listed computer skills and competency in foreign languages as significant issues for employers to consider.

Richard Fein, director of placement for the School of Management, outlined five principles of using the job fair to one's advantage. The first principle, Fein stressed, is to go.

"Most people have been in school for 15 or 16 years now, and it's worth the effort to put in a couple of hours at the job fair," Fein said. "It's a very small investment with a very big pay off."

Fein also pointed out how career fairs are the place to make contacts, and to keep up contacts. An important principle of taking advantage of the job fair is to keep up a connection with the potential employers. Fein recommends asking for their business card, and then following up the meeting with a brief note and an additional resume. He also suggests calling them within a week.

"It shows them that you are willing to take the initiative. That puts you in a very favorable light and puts you at the top of the pack," he said.

Acker said that students should dress, "business casual," which she defined as, "something a little dressy, more than what you would just wear to class."

However, if students do not have the time to find something "business casual" before the fair, they are still encouraged to stop by, according to Stoia.

"If you can dress up, do dress up, but if you can't, come anyway. We're kind of trying to get a relaxed tone across to students, so they should just come," she said.

Belfast joins together in hope of cease fire

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland united in prayer for peace Sunday and waited anxiously to see if violence would tear them apart once more. The IRA's decision to end its 17-month cease-fire with a deadly bomb in London threatened to restart Northern Ireland's cycle of violence. But across the religious divide, priests and ministers called for calm.

"Father, we pray that the moment of madness will not destroy all the hopes," Pastor Jack McKee preached to his youthful, sometimes tearful congregation at Elim Pentecostal Mission, one of more than a dozen Protestant churches along west Belfast's Shankill Road.

"We pray for Gerry Adams," McKee said of the leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party, a figure reviled by Shankill residents because of his past support for attacks on pro-British Protestant militants who live there.

"We may all hate what he stands for," McKee said. "But we must pray that the leaders of Sinn Fein, and the leaders of loyalist [pro-British] paramilitaries, will not surrender to the hawks within their own ranks. We need to pray that they will not take Northern Ireland back into the abyss."

He said he was sure that the first

Hospital offers students chance to 'shadow' physicians

By Melanie B. Arruda
Collegian Staff

University students are offered a real-world glimpse of what it is like to be a physician through the Cooley Dickinson Hospital Pre-Med Shadowing Program.

"It gave us a chance to see what goes on in the daily life of doctors, something you don't see as a patient," said student Christine Ressel, who participated in the two-week winter session program.

Students see doctors at work by observing patient care in hospital departments and by shadowing CDH physicians in the process. For one week, students are paired with a different CDH physician each day observing the doctor and patient during procedures, instructions, and interpretations of test results.

Pre-med students meet up with the physician in the morning prior to going on hospital rounds and secing patients with physicians in their office, said Health Promotion Manager at CDH Jeff Harness.

"The shadowing program exposes students to different situations and different medical specialties," he said. Students can use this opportunity as a career determining factor, he added.

"The [shadowing program] reinforced what I knew and what I already wanted to do," said Ressel, who is aspiring to be a obstetrician gynecologist. "I got to see three births and a circumcision," she said.

Participants receive visual experience through various hospital departments. They become oriented to the hospital by serving half-day rotations between hospital departments.

"It was an invaluable experience because we got to see all different parts of the hospital," Ressel said.

Hospital departments include the operating rooms, emergency department, medical/surgical nursing units, oncology unit, adult/pediatric unit, intensive care unit, psychiatric unit, pathology, radiation therapy and radiology. As a new component of the program, students are now allowed to observe the work of Northampton Ambulance and Hospice of Hampshire County.

The ambulance service offers the participants the opportunity to ride with Emergency Medical Technicians on calls.

The hospice component of this recent addition revolves around a program that serves people with terminal illnesses in an attempt to keep them out of institutions. Participants visit terminally ill patients who are being treated in their homes and receiving a type of treatment that allows them to live life as much as possible, Harness said.

In operating rooms, the participants are exposed to different types of surgical procedures. Before entering the operating room, students are taught how to get dressed for surgery and scrub their hands. They also learn about anesthesiology and

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

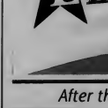
Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature every day.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

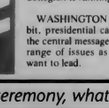
The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

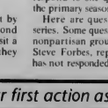
After the inauguration ceremony, what would be your first action as president?



Bill Clinton
My first action after inauguration, 1997, will be to continue our policies of economic growth consistent with our values, and investing in our future, ensuring that America will meet the challenges of the 21st century."

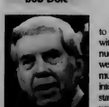


Bob Dole
"I will call upon Congress to pass a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution."



Phil Graham
"As president, my first official action will be an executive order abolishing all quotas, set-asides and hiring preferences in the executive branch of the federal government."

Lamar Alexander
"After insuring that we are on a path to a balanced budget, I would send to Congress a proposal to completely reform the federal income tax system: simplifying the rules, rolling back the tax hikes of 1993 and 1990, eliminating the capital gains tax, increasing the exemption for working families and limiting deductions."



Richard Lugar
"I will call the Russian president to emphasize my desire to work with him to ensure the security of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons and fissile materials. We must not allow such weapons to fall into the hands of terrorists or hostile states. As commander in chief, I would also meet with defense and military leaders in our own government to emphasize that this is our most urgent priority."

Pat Buchanan
"Signing executive orders abolishing quotas, set asides and affirmative action in government and reversing Bill Clinton's pro-abortion decrees."

New I.D. access planned, tested in Coolidge, JQA

By Amy H. Parodysz
Collegian Staff

In an effort to increase security in the residence halls, Housing Services has installed automated I.D. card access at the front doors of Coolidge and John Quincy Adams Towers.

The security systems in the two towers are the first phase of a plan to extend card access to all the residence halls by the fall of 1997.

The system reads the I.D. card, allowing access only to individuals who live in that building. Residents of the two towers enter with the swipe of a card.

"The reality is it's just a different key," said Michael Gilbert, acting director of Housing Services.

Students still need to carry a key to unlock their room doors, but there are advantages to I.D. card access.

"People used to sign out back-up keys and give them to a friend," said Jeff Cullen, residence director in Coolidge Tower. "There are a lot of keys floating around out there. Now if somebody loses their I.D., within minutes it can be disabled."

If an I.D. card is lost or stolen, students may "sign out" a temporary access card through their cluster office. Such a card provides access until the end of the first business day after it was issued. If the card is not returned to the cluster office within five days, the student will be billed an $8 replacement charge.

Another change is that doors can no longer be propped open. Within a minute after an individual exits any door, an alarm goes off.

Residence assistants used to lock the doors at night, but "now [Housing Services] can be directed to where there is a problem," said Sharon Sherlin, interim assistant director of computer and information systems for Housing Services.

Housing Services responds to the door alarms Mon. through Fri., 7 a.m. until 11:30 p.m. Public Safety is responsible during the weekends and overnight.

"It doesn't change what was supposed to have been the practice," Cullen said. For example, visitors will still be signed in at the security desk.

"You can still tailgate someone through the door," Cullen said.

Housing Services is able to turn the system off, which they plan to do when students move in at the begin-the relationship between the surgical team of nurses and doctors.

"Students typically see a whole spectrum of problems," Harness said in reference to those shadowing in the emergency department.

According to Harness, they are exposed to a variety of experiences in the emergency room, from acute heart attacks to ear infections.

As part of shadowing the emergency department, students are taught how substance abuse impacts the evaluation of a patient's condition. For example, it is troublesome for doctors to accurately diagnose someone who is under the influence of alcohol and complaining of a broken leg, Harness explained.

In another department, medical/surgical nursing units, cancer patients and orthopedic patients are two types of patients. Joint and hip replacement are some of the procedures orthopedic patients go through, according to Harness.

Students also deal with Pre-Operative and Post-Operative patients in the medical/surgical units. The shadowed doctors treat patients with blood-born infections who are placed on intravenous antibiotics.

In the shadowing program, students are exposed to primary care and other specialties like obstetrics. Primary care focuses on the one doctor who knows of a patient's entire health background and is knowledgeable is all branches of medicine.

"The most important thing I got from this was that I could see things through the point of view of doctors," Ressel said.

Criteria for the shadowing program includes class status, grade point average and an applicant essay discussing why the applicant would benefit from the program, said Pre-Med Advisor Brian O'Conner. Applicants should be in their junior or senior year or in the process of submitting medical school applications.

"I would encourage every Pre-med student to apply for this opportunity," Ressel said. "It was just so invaluable to me."

The program was started in 1983 by Northampton surgeon John Parsons, M.D., and Phil Reid, a Smith College biology professor. Doctor Parsons and Doctor Paul Berman serve as physician advisors for the program.

Catholic or Protestant killed would mean a death warrant for someone on the other side.

"Lord, don't let it be," whispered Anne McWilliams, a mother of two who sat, head bowed, in the back row.

A half-mile away, beyond the wall of concrete and steel that separates Catholic from Protestant in west Belfast, worshipers at Clonard Monastery read a special prayer for peace and reconciliation.

The Rev. Paddy O'Donnell read from Jesus' sermon on the mount and emphasized his instruction, "Reconcile with your brother first and then come back and make your offering [otherwise] you will go to prison."

The scripture had special meaning for a parish that includes many prominent IRA supporters, who are split over whether they should resume violence.

"The bomb is a symbol of hurt and devastation in London, and the buildings with things hanging out the windows are a symbol of the peace process in tatters," said Claire Cassidy, lead vocalist in the Clonard choir.

"It's also a monument to John Major's lack of imagination," she said, reflecting widespread Catholic anger at the British prime minister.

Britain had demanded that the IRA show its cease-fire was permanent by starting to disarm before Sinn Fein entered negotiations with Protestants. The IRA refused, considering such a move equal to surrender.

Pro-British militants, who laid down their weapons six weeks after the IRA, have so far stuck to their cease-fire. But McWilliams, at McKee's mission, wasn't confident that prayers would keep the gunmen at bay.

"Sure if the gunmen had ever thought of God, they couldn't do what they do," she said.

Keys may only be used at the front door if there is a problem with the reader, which happened once in Coolidge Tower last week.

"Until you do a pilot, you don't know how well prepared you are to do the whole program," Gilbert explained. Overall, there have been few problems, he said.

The initial first phase included all five towers in Southwest Residential Area, but this was revised.

"If we did two we could do two better than we could do five," Shevlin said.

The current plan is to expand card access to all remaining halls in Southwest by the fall of 1996, to Northeast and Sylvan Residential Areas by the spring of 1997, and to Orchard Hill and Central Residential Areas by the fall of 1997.

The card access system is in conjunction with the all- campus card concept, according to Shevlin.

"It has started out separate but it will move toward the same thread," she said.

Hillel group combines tradition with song

By Jason Rubin
Collegian Staff

The Hillel House at the University of Massachusetts is a long way from the jazz clubs of New York City. For Lori Winters, leader of the Kolot Workshop, the travel was well worth it.

Kolot is the end result of four vocalists with vastly different backgrounds, combining to create an original musical experience.

Winters brings more than 15 years of professional singing experience to the group. Along with the enthusiasm of Avi Wolf, Melissa Haas, and Louis Shein the music is a success.

The members of Kolot joined together to offer their unique blend of traditional, and contemporary harmonies to the UMass campus.

"A lot of schools have harmony acappella groups," Shein said. "We are just trying to expand what Hillel has to offer the students, and at the same time it's a way to open it up for the students to explore their cultural roots."

By drawing upon foundations that can be traced to numerous cultural origins, each one of their performances gives the audience a chance to go home with something different. One song was in English, while the next was in Hebrew. To go with the frequent lyrical changes, Kolot alters the tempo of the selections with great ease. The song can begin as a soft, soothing melody, and finish as a rousing march. The audience never knows what to expect.

"Our goal was to create an open atmosphere, where you can learn things that you never knew before," Winters said.

Now that the workshop has tapped into the student population, the group intends to focus their plans on other audiences. It is their hope, that they will receive a grant that will enable them to perform to a more widespread audience.

Currently, the workshop can be seen at the Hillel House, on North Pleasant St., in Amherst.

For schedule information, contact the Hillel House at 549-1710. Each performance is free, and open to all audiences.

Help slow to arrive for victims of Northwest flood

By Martha Irvine
Associated Press

BIRKENFELD, Ore. — Stranded for days by bloated rivers and washed-out roads, rural Northwesterners are finding their self-reliance tested by the region's worst flooding in decades.

As rivers receded ever so slowly Sunday, brigades of emergency workers fanned out to assist flood victims in cities and suburbs. But in the Northwest's backwoods corners, neighbor had to rely on neighbor.

The same raging waters that poured through thousands of homes last week also chewed up roads and pulled down utility lines, isolating some of the hardest-hit areas of Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana.

The floods took seven lives — four in Oregon, two in Montana, one in Washington.

In the evergreen thumb of the Cascade Range that pokes into Oregon's Northwestern corner, winding two-lane roads often hug the banks of mountain creeks and rivers. Highway 202, for example, crosses and recrosses the Nehalem River, usually a sparkling, boulder-dotted stream, now an ugly brown band ripping through canyons.

Throughout Clatsop and Columbia counties, churning streams leapt their channels, taking out roads and catching residents by surprise.

"It's a lot worse than we ever imagined," said Ron Youngberg of the St. Helens Rural Fire Department. "The Nehalem kicked their butts."

Now, for some returning evacuees, "There's nothing left to go back to," Youngberg said. "They're having a hard time coming back to reality."

On the Oregon coast, Tillamook County dairy farmer Steve Neahring lost at least 100 of his 175 Holstein and Jersey milkers. Some drowned; some had to be shot after getting chilled to the bone or breaking their legs in panicky struggles in flooded barns.

As Neahring maneuvered a front-end loader to stack muddy carcasses through the weekend, more than 20 friends and neighbors pitched in. A deli near the beach in Manzanita donated lunches; farm wives supplied food and thermoses of coffee.

"It's everybody helping everybody," said LaRayne Woodward, who lives on the dairy farm across the river from Neahring's spread. "This is when you find out what good neighbors you have."

A mile downriver along the main street of Nehalem, population 230, cleanup proceeded to the beat of pounding hammers, scraping shovels and spraying water.

And at a worship service in the little farming town of Scio, east of Salem, the phone-company manager Tom Barth joined others who stood and shared their feelings about the flood.

Barth thanked all those who had stacked sandbags around the phone company and helped save it.

"I couldn't believe the folks who showed up — people I don't even know," he said, "People I probably disconnected for nonpayment."

Throughout the region, hundreds of roads remained closed, including two main highways out of Portland. Crews said a mudslide along Interstate 84 in Oregon's Columbia River Gorge may not be cleared until Wednesday. Interstate 5 in southern Washington, closed since Thursday by a mudslide and high water, was reopened Sunday afternoon.

In Washington, preliminary surveys the Red Cross compiled Saturday indicated 56 houses and mobile homes destroyed, 750 with major damage and 1,700 with slight damage in 22 counties.

In southeastern Washington's Columbia County, two National Guard helicopters were dispatched Sunday to haul food and medicine to about 60 stranded families. One diabetic man, age 19, couldn't wait and hiked out 5 miles with his parents to get insulin, said Roger Trump, county emergency management director.

In northern Idaho, about 2,500 people remained out of their homes Sunday, and hundreds more were cut off from the outside world.

Dozens of families were stranded along 20 miles of the swollen Coeur d'Alene River. "It's gradually subsiding, but not enough to really matter," said state disaster services spokesman Darren Blagburn.

In Orofino, flooding along seven miles of Orofino Creek destroyed a church and several homes. Another church, the Orofino Tabernacle, stood precariously at the eroded creekside. Its reader board said simply, "Pray!"

In Montana, water levels dropped in ice-choked rivers that had flooded about 300 homes near Libby, but Gov. Marc Racicot warned that a big ice jam could cause major flooding on the lower Yellowstone River.

An open letter to the UMass Student Community from the Director of the UHS Eye Care Program
Spring 1996

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Program

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and the New England College of Optometry in 1975. I am very proud of the high quality of eye care delivered to more than 80,000 individuals over the last 20 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of the New England College of Optometry and recently co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. In addition, I am credentialed in diagnostic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry.

Eye care services include:

- Complete optometry examinations
- Reduced rates on spectacle frames and lenses from local participating opticians
- Emergency eye care
- Comprehensive contact lens service

Our staff takes great pride in being able to fit many people who have had difficulty in the past wearing contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Program over the years has been consistently excellent.

They're no angels

Right before the start of one of his interminable number of futile presidential campaigns, Sen. Robert J. Dole published a book, The Doles Unlimited Partners, along with his wife, Elizabeth H Dole. The unfathomably awful opus was propaganda in the continuing effort of surly Bob and intelligent Liddy, a pair only slightly less ambitious than Iago, to storm the White House.

What we did not know at the time was that the Doles were partners in business as well as in politics of the depths to which they would sink to make a buck.

Because Bob and Liddy want to take the presidency from "co-presidents" Bill and Hillary, they've toned down the talk of an "unlimited partnership." But in 1988, the Doles presented themselves as the Republican version of the power couple the GOP now loves to loathe. Strong, resolute Bob would be president, and witty, subtle Liddy would be there to help him out. After all, Liddy has served in the cabinets of two presidents; Bob is batting 000.

Peter Orvetti

Wary Democrats can feel good about one thing — In the extremely unlikely case that Dole should defeat Clinton, we might not notice much of a difference. Bob and Liddy are just like Bill and Hillary in a lot of ways they don't want to admit.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, everyone's favorite feminist, education booster, health care activist and white-collar criminal could be the death of her husband's administration. Ignoring the poet's warning that "there isn't any there there," Sen. Alfonse D'Amato has moved from persecution to prosecution in his case against Hillary. She did it, it is true. But D'Amato is going to try to make "it" look a lot more substantial than it really is. (Of course, picking D'Amato to ferret out financial corruption is like getting John Gotti to head an anti-crime task force.)

During Bob Dole's 1988 campaign, the campaign of Unlimited Partners, a high ranking member of Dole's team took a fall. The operative, a former lieutenant governor of Dole's Kansas recognized as the Senator's most loyal basiker, had his fingers on some dirty campaign money. Elizabeth Hanford Dole, whose personal finances were handled by the operative, knew about it. The money went into his campaign. When it was mentioned by reporters, Dole fired his old friend. The buddy went to prison; Dole became Majority Leader of the U.S. Senate, and Republican front-runner for 1996.

A new biography of Dole written by one of his former Senate aides states that Dole the Senator has nary a scruple more than Dole the candidate. Arguably the most powerful senator in the country, Dole continues to be a tool of the highest bidder. He is a lobbyist's dream.

That makes the poor boy from Kansas who went to war seem little different from the poor boy from Arkansas who dodged it. But Elizabeth Hanford Dole may end up being as much of a burden on her husband as Hillary Rodham Clinton is on the president.

When Dole lost in 1988, Liddy, who had resigned from Reagan's cabinet to help her husband run, went to work as the head of the Red Cross. She believed in the organization; plus, it was a public relations coup. No one could put down the once-and-future candidate's wife, who was saving lives. (Elizabeth Dole makes no secret of the fact that she wants to be married to a president. She loved Bob first for this, and only later as a man.)

Now it turns out that Elizabeth donated less to the cause she ran, than she had publicly stated she would. That's not too much of a problem — she forgot a few checks. Okay, so she's getting ready to write a check for $75,000 to make up the difference. What's wrong here?

Elizabeth Dole wrote off the publicly announced amount on the Doles' taxes, while keeping some of that money. Moreover, since her political closeness to her husband was known, Liddy swore to the Senate that she would give all her speech-making fees to a Red Cross program for poor children. So far, she has pocketed $440,000.

That's the bond that ties the Doles together — they earnestly believe in their ideals, but don't see anything wrong with making a little bit of change on the side. What Elizabeth Hanford Dole did is not technically theft but it certainly isn't ethical behavior befitting the head of the Red Cross, or the co-President of the United States. Even the last infamous Republican named Liddy never robbed the Red Cross.

Neither Hillary nor Liddy is any better than the other, but both of these well-off women who married formerly impoverished men have found creative ways of staying rich. And neither Bill Clinton or Bob Dole can denounce the other's morals — funny, money got them each where they are today. But as D'Amato, Dole's campaign manager and probable Treasury Secretary-to-be, continues his Whitewater crusade, America should at least know that the crooks won't be on just one side of the ballot this November.

Arrested on the 'net

On Feb. 8, President Bill Clinton signed the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

The main part of the bill is meant to deregulate the telecommunications industry, which proponents claim will cause an increase in employment and smaller fees.

However, attached to the bill is the Communications Decency Act, aimed at creating guidelines for what can and cannot be transmitted over the internet.

The first part of the bill is unlikely to affect college students besides seeing more annoying telephone commercials on television.

The second part of the law, which even House Speaker Newt Gingrich voted against, included in the final bill sent to the President, is much more troubling.

It mandates a fine and up to two years in prison for anyone who, "uses any interactive computer service to display in a manner available to a person under 18 years of age, any comment, request, suggestion, proposal, image or other communication that, in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs, regardless of whether such service placed the call or initiated the communication..." (Section 223 (47 U.S.C. 223)).

Regulating the internet is not something that can be done very easily. With a medium that does not recognize national borders, it is hard to see how one nation's laws can affect internet users in other countries.

Jacob W. Michaels

For instance, Germany has laws against distribution of material denying the Holocaust, while the United States doesn't. Yet material posted from the U.S. can be accessed in Germany. This law raises more of these same questions such as what happens if someone in Great Britain sends "smut" to a user in the U.S.? However, that is not the main problem.

The First Amendment clearly states that, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech."

Yet, in the words of Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), "Instead of championing the First Amendment .. the Communications Decency Act tramples on the principles of free speech and free flow of information that has fueled the growth of this medium."

Now it's under standable where this bill came from. The desire to protect children from some of the people and images on the net is legitimate. However, it just goes way too far. The majority of people who use the internet are normal people who are just looking to talk to other people with similar interests, not the law breaking sexual-deviants Congress and media make them out to be.

What seems truly amazing is that this bill makes information that is perfectly legal, if not lauded, in other mediums, illegal in this new medium.

Take a piece of classic American literature. The Catcher in the Rye. Want to put a piece of it on the World Wide Web? Careful, it could get you two years up the river. Maybe you're an art lover and want to put a picture of Michelangelo's David on your web page to share with the rest of the world. Better hope no one from the government happens to see your page, because now it could be a federal offense.

And it gets worse. This bill makes it illegal to transmit information about abortion, a legal procedure in the United States, through e-mail or on various discussion groups.

This law does no more than make a complete mockery of our freedom of speech.

The only positive aspect of this bill, which only 20-some members of Congress voted against, is it should easily be declared unconstitutional.

Already, various civil liberties groups are challenging the law in court. Several senators are introducing legislation to try to appeal the unconstitutional parts of the bill before they get to court. Leahy and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) have introduced a bill to appeal the Communications Decency Act and Patricia Shroeder (D-Colo.) is trying to get rid of the Comstock Amendment, which is what classifies the information about abortion as obscene. Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) has also attacked the amendment, including joining in an internet protest involving people turning their web pages black.

So what can students do to get this attack on our freedom repealed? Check out the Web page at http://www.eff.org/ for more information about this attack on our Constitutional freedom, and then write your representatives and ask them to repeal it.

Some other ideas to make the tax system fairer...
MAKE THE SOCIAL SECURITY TAX FLAT SOCIAL SECURITY
...INSTEAD OF LETTING INCOME OVER $60,000 GO UNTAXED. THEN INCOME UNDER $60,000 COULD BE TAXED LESS.
PRESERVE THE HOME MORTGAGE DEDUCTION'S ABILITY TO ENCOURAGE HOME OWNERSHIP
...BY LIMITING IT TO MORTGAGES OF $100,000 OR LESS, DROPPING ITS USE FOR MILLION-DOLLAR HOUSES, SECOND HOMES, AND YACHTS IMPOSE A WEALTH TAX, FLAT IF YOU LIKE, ON PERSONALLY HELD WEALTH, AS OPPOSED TO INCOME.
WEALTH, NOT INCOME, IS WHERE THE REAL MONEY IS. THEN INCOME TAXES COULD BE CUT.
GIVE A BIG TAX BREAK TO ANY CANDIDATE WHO WOULD PROPOSE THESE, OR EVEN BRING THEM UP.
BECAUSE THERE AREN'T ANY NOW.
DOES
...OR AT LEAST TO CARTOONISTS WHO WILL.

Flat tax fluke

This year is another election year, and politicians are putting a new spin on an old issue — taxes. In the past politicians talked about cutting taxes, but this year's spin is replacing the existing progressive tax system with a flat rate system.

Under the current tax system, the poor pay a lower rate then the rich. However, a flat tax would force the poor to pay a higher proportion of their income then the rich — so when a candidate such as Steve Forbes states everyone will pay less under his plan, he is wrong.

Matthew Wurtzel

Currently, a family making about $25,000 a year before taxes would pay a rate of five percent, or $1250. Meanwhile a family making over $100,000 would pay a rate of about 27 percent, so they would pay $27,000. However, under Forbes' plan the family making $25,000 would pay $4250 at a 17 percent tax rate while the family earning $100,000 would pay $17,000 at the same tax rate.

Proponents of the flat tax system neglect to realize the importance the progressive tax system plays in our economy. By taxing people of different incomes at different rates, the government helps soften the effects of a recession upon individuals and the economy as a whole.

If someone is forced to take a lower paying job during a recession, the individual's tax rate would probably drop too; so the person's spending will not dramatically change because their after tax income, or what economists call disposable income, would not significantly decrease. A family earning about $30,000 pays $4500 in taxes at rate of about 15 percent. However, should the family be forced to take a $5000 pay cut, then they would only pay $1250, so their disposable income would change from $25,500 to $23,750.

However, this softening effect will not occur if there is a flat tax because the tax rate will remain unchanged, so disposable income will dramatically drop. Take the same families under the same circumstance as above for example. Under the flat tax system the family earning $30,000 would pay $5100 before the recession, but during the downturn they would pay $4250 which would lower their disposable income from $24,900 to $20,750.

If an individual's disposable income changes, then their spending changes. Spending is a powerful part of our economy's performance. If spending drops, then aggregate demand, which is often measured through Gross Domestic Product, will drop. A recession is a decline in Gross Domestic Product, so if spending drops GDP will continue to fall. Economic instability could arise because a flat tax would dramatically change disposable income.

The establishment of the progressive tax system is almost as revolutionary as democracy was when this nation was founded. In the past, the poor paid the brunt of taxes. However, the poor stopped paying an unfair share when Britain and the United States established income taxes in the 19th century.

If a flat tax system is adopted, when we graduate and get jobs paying about $25,000 we will pay the same tax rate as Bill Gates and Ross Perot. Nobody likes taxes, but remember only death and taxes are inevitable.

Letters to the Editor

McGrath spaced out

To the editor:

I strongly disagree with Mark McGrath's notion that the search for extraterrestrial life is detrimental to the human spirit (Feb. 4, p. 4). He states that the rewards of discovery may be overshadowed by the losses incurred. While I grant that the chances of finding intelligent life are exceedingly small, the question is certainly an important one and not in the category of "knowledge for knowledge's sake." The discovery or refutation of life in another star system will no more limit our imagination than the finding of the New World did for 15th century Europeans. Rather, our awe of the natural universe will be enhanced. Hasn't the knowledge that planets and stars are not mere points of light but are rather actual physical places increased our wonder?

The universe is big, with about 100 billion galaxies, each filled with about 100 billion stars. The limitless bounds of space will make sure that our imagination does not run dry. Considering the money we spend on books and movies that speculate on outer space, a bit of investment to discover what is really out there is well worth it.

Cut it out, M.F.

To the Editor:

Some clowns don't seem to know when to quit. "M.F." is one of those clowns. For some time now, UMass has had to endure "The M. F. Jones Show." Now, we've been asked to endure what it has turned into, "The Hungry Clown Show," via the Weld for president scam. That's not too surprising since this hungry opportunist with his mouth open is all too willing to lick any hand he hopes will feed him. Politics sucks out loud. "M.F." is back, and he's loud. Sleaze, sleaze, sleaze, will you stop it?

Poetry celebrated in film

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

"We were never meant to survive," wrote Audre Lorde. The self-described black, lesbian, feminist, warrior, poet and mother will be the subject of the film, A Litany For Survival: The Life and Work of Audre Lorde.

The documentary by Ada Gay Griffin and Michelle Parkinson will be shown at the Augusta Savage Gallery on Feb. 13 at 7 p.m.

Lorde, a controversial and celebrated writer, cultural theorist and activist was born in Harlem in 1934. She began to read and recite poetry at a very early age, and when she could no longer find poems that adequately conveyed her feelings she began to write her own.

Lorde embodied the struggles of the human rights movement and was one of the first writers to publish over a dozen volumes of poetry and essays on race, gender, sexual identity and justice. Her collection of essays, A Burst Of Light, won the American Book Award in 1989. Lorde asserted that most people in American society live with multiple social personalities and with many different strategies for survival and change.

She died in 1992 after a struggle with breast cancer.

After the film, there will be a discussion with producer/director Griffin. Griffin and Parkinson have successfully woven together conversations with Lorde's family, companions and friends.

Also included in the film are interviews conducted with Lorde over the last few years of her life and archival footage of her writings and readings.

The Augusta Savage Gallery is located in the New Africa House near University Health Services. The gallery is wheelchair-accessible with an entrance in the back of the building. The event is free and open to the general public. For more information please call 545-5177.

Energetic Yo La Tengo electrified Amherst

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

YO LO TENGO
Amherst College Frontroom
Feb. 8

Many bands have worshipped the words and sounds of the Velvet Underground, but few if any have captured the band's creativeness and energy as well as Yo Lo Tengo. This was obvious at their recent show in the Amherst College Frontroom, as the Hoboken, N.J. trio blew the crowd away with their VU-influenced tunes.

For the past decade the husband and wife duo of Ira Kaplan, guitarist, and Georgia Hubley, drummer, have been one of the most consistent songwriting teams in the music world. The addition of bassist James McNew has only added a new stability to the band. On stage the three feed off each other with amazing energy and precision, creating a whirlpool of songs ranging from passionate tender moments to feedback laden noise bursts.

Opening with an old single, "From A Motel 6," the band prepared the crowd for an hour-long onslaught of hits from their last three albums, Electr-o-Pura, Painful and Fakebook. The highlights included a mind-blowing version of "False Alarm" which featured Kaplan's energetic performance on the keyboards.

An added special treat came midway through the set when McNew took over vocal duties to perform a song from his alter ego, Dump.

Hubley stepped forward from the shadows of her drum kit to sing lead vocals on two tracks, "What Can I Say" and "Nowhere Near." The former tune, an NRBQ cover, was dedicated to opening act Ray Mason.

"(Straight Down To The) Bitter End," the closing song proved to be the show's highlight. For what seemed like an eternity, the band soared through an electrifying jam that rivalled the best of the Velvet Underground.

After a few minutes of crowd cheering, the band returned for a short but sweet two-song solo. The duet between Hubley and Kaplan on "The Summer" proved to be the most beautiful portion of the evening. The final song was a cover of the Kinks' tune "This Is Where I Belong."

Containe, featuring Fontaine Toups of Versus, opened up with a subdued but gorgeous set while local legends, the Ray Mason Band served up a set chock full of classic pop tunes.

Music, lights, costume add flavor to Cuban national Folk ensemble

By Lorraine Urbanski
Collegian Correspondent

THE CUBAN NATIONAL FOLKLORIC DANCE
Fine Arts Center
Feb. 9

The Cuban National Folkloric Dance Ensemble performed Friday evening at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall in front of an enthusiastic audience. This group, consisting of 40 musicians and dancers, under the choreography of Manolo Micler, incorporated dances with influences of Caribbean, European (Spanish and French) and African (Yoruba, Congo, Arara and Carabali) cultures.

The ensemble was directed by Teresa Gonzalez Martinez, with the help of Art Director/Folkloric Advisor Rogelio Martinez Fure, who has conducted recitals in Cuba, Poland, Bulgaria and France. The performance's executive producer was Michel Vega. The performers danced, sang and played their instruments with full passion and energy, occasionally adding subtle humor.

The Afro-Cuban flavor of the traditional dances was expressed well by the ensemble with the help of a few musical and vocalist spotlights, which added to the atmosphere exquisitely. Through their dances, they told the stories of Cuban peasantry of the 19th century and the struggles of African Cuban ancestors.

Religion was one symbol shown through a piece entitled Yemaya, so named after the Mistress of the Sea and Goddess of the deities of the Santeria religion. Her dances represented the movement of the sea, and a group of women danced around her in symbolic worship.

The theme of revolution was expressed in "Tumba Francesa," which depicted the culture during the Haitian Revolution against the French at the end of the 18th century and beginning of the 19th century.

Critically important for any performance are the costums and the lighting designs. The performers' dress worked with the dance and music to add more to the symbolism of the piece. Miriam Duenas achieved this look perfectly, right down to the basket-hats which were worn in the "Danza de las Canastas (Basket Dance)" and the blue gowns worn in "Yemaya," which represented waves of water.

The lighting was done by Carlos Repilado. His design set off different moods, some frightening, as in "Ogun", others added humor and energy as in "Descarga de Rumbas y Comparsas."

After several members of the audience joined the performers on stage for a dance or two and a comical cast member left the stage to join the audience for a laugh, the Cuban National Folkloric Dance Ensemble received great praise from the crowd through several standing ovations. It was an evening full of tradition, style and energy. Also the group of performers taught the audience a part of their own culture.

Overall, a great deal was expressed to the audience through the dance and music regarding the history and culture of this society. It all goes to show how powerful and essential these forms of art are.

Cajun band promises spicy–hot show

By Jennifer Howell
Collegian Correspondent

Rolling Stone magazine called them, "the best damn dance band you'll ever hear," but that is only a small share of the praise commonly given to the premier Cajun band, Beausoleil, who perform tonight at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton.

Beausoleil, veteran of over a dozen albums, and nominated for six Grammys, bring experience and tradition to their music. The Lafayette, Louisiana–based band has been making music since the early 1970s with a rarely changing line–up and a commitment to studying the history of musical form. Current members include Michael Doucet (lead vocals, fiddle), David Doucet (guitar, lead and backing vocals), Jimmy Breaux (Acadian accordion), Al Tharp (bass, banjo, fiddle, backing vocals) and Tommy Alesi (drums).

Beausoleil has won praise from such diverse sources as Mary–Chapin Carpenter, Garrison Keillor (who called them "the best Cajun band in the world") and Rolling Stone guitarist Keith Richards. They've opened for the Grateful Dead, performed for audiences including Bruce Springsteen and U2's Bono and performed at the presidential inaugurations of Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter.

Cajun music originated in the Louisiana bayous. It combines traditional French songs with outside influences of country music and rhythm & blues.

Beausoleil's particular brand of Cajun ranges anywhere from traditional Cajun music to tunes with more contemporary and varied influences including Tex–Mex and Caribbean. They blend French and English vocals— sometimes within one song— and the mood of the music ranges from infectiously danceable, to wryly humorous, to moodily romantic. Song subjects range from love and good times to voodoo and New Orleans history.

Doucet began making Cajun music when the form was nearly unknown outside of Louisiana, though to him it was as common as singing Christmas carols. He started performing on a regular basis in the mid–1970s in two different bands, one of which evolved into Beausoleil.

While Doucet created new music with his band, he also researched, listened to, learned and remade old music. With the help of a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, Doucet tracked down and learned from original Cajun artists, whose influences are present in Beausoleil's music.

For those seeking a cure to the mid–winter blues, a cheap way to visit the Louisiana bayou country, a soundtrack to an Anne Rice novel, an introduction to the form of Cajun music, or just a night of fun dancing and song, Beausoleil should fit the bill.

Beausoleil will be performing at 7:00 p.m. Monday Feb. 12, at the Iron Horse music hall in Northampton. Tickets are $17.50 and are available from the Northampton Box Office, Thornes Marketplace, 586–8686, or 1–800–TIE–TICK.

UMass to host culturally mixed music ensemble

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The sounds of Baroque through contemporary music will fill Bezanson Hall Wednesday night as ANCORA, an ensemble of members from the University of Massachusetts Department of Music & Dance faculty take the stage.

Works by J.S. Bach, Darrell Katz, Peter Schatten, Hsueh– Hung Shen and Robert Stern will be performed.

The concert, which begins at 8:15 p.m. will also include the world premiere of "Mejorna" (pronounced meh–how–rah– nah). Mejorna is a type of dance and song of mostly urban mestizos — people of mixed Spanish and American Indian ancestry who live in Panama.

The three movement piece portrays the problems, desires and longings of the people as they sort through their identity in the existing culture. The work was composed during the summer of 1995 by Erick Parris and was dedicated to ANCORA Parris received his master and doctorate degrees in composition from UMass.

Parris, who emigrated to the United States from his native Panama, is on the faculty of Atlantic Union College. His compositions have been performed throughout the United States. A resident of Westfield, Parris directed choral activities at the Peck Middle School in Holyoke

Tickets to the event are $2.50 for students, children and senior citizens. UMass students are admitted free with valid I.D. Tickets are available at the box office by calling 545–2511 or at the Bezanson Recital Hall on the evening on February 14.

Catch the Ramones one last time

Punk legends, The Ramones are ready to set Pearl Street ablaze one last time.

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

What's next — a farewell package tour with the Cure, Ozzy Osbourne AND the Ramones? How many times can these acts bill their tour as their last tour forever? Based on past history don't be surprised if America's greatest punk band stop through town several more times in the near future.

But if this actually is the Ramones final local gig it is not an event music fans want to miss.

The Ramones were punk rock back when Green Day and Rancid were in diapers, even before the Sex Pistols or the Clash broke. Their blitzkrieg punk pop tunes revolutionized the music scene. By performing classic pup songs at lightning fast speed, the Ramones set the basic three–chord punk structure for countless bands.

They may not have broke the rules like the Velvet Underground or the Stooges but the Ramones brought underground punk into the real world. Their leather jackets, long straggly hair and "in your face" attitude attracted hordes of punk rock kids who knew there was more to life than making out to Bad Company and Lynard Skynard.

Their first two albums, The Ramones and The Ramones Leave Home have withstood the test of time far better than anything the Sex Pistols ever recorded Equally so, this is one show that will not be forgotten soon. They may leave Northampton for one last time but their spirit will never leave the punk world.

The Ramones and Gren perform at Pearl Street Feb. 15. Tickets are $18.50 in advance, $20 at the door. The show is 18+. Call the club at 584–7771 for more information.

his baskets came from behind the three–point line and tied the team record for most three–pointers in a single game.

Even with that finishing run, Temple coach John Chaney didn't feel any more comfortable about the game.

"No, because our team is only going to rise to that level when we have a lucky night shooting," he explained, pointing to his team 35 percent shooting from the field in the first half. "When we are hitting baskets it might happen that we hold on with our defense, but [UMass] is a great team."

The Minutemen proved the Temple coach right by blowing the doors off the Owls, coming out of the locker room with an 18–2 run to start the second half pushing the lead to 54– 32 with less than 12 minutes to play. Temple would never get any closer than 19 the rest of the way.

Though coach John Calipari didn't get the quite the usual production form his Player of the Year candidate Marcus Camby, 10 points, seven boards, four assists and five blocks the other four starters picked up the slack.

Forwards Bright and Dana Dingle once again were solid up front, each contributing 13 points. They also did the little things well as Dingle grabbed eight boards while Bright dished out six assists, many of them spectacular, highlighted by a no look pass to Camby for an uncontested dunk.

Travieso's and his backcourt mate Edgar Padilla's line score reads like a coach's fantasy: 39 points, seven rebounds, 10 assists and seven steals to only three turnovers.

Chaney emphasized the guard play of both teams as being a major difference in the game.

"Our guards [are] our problem," Chaney said about his backcourt of Johnny Miller and Levan Alston. "I've never had a team where the lead guard has committed four turnovers and my two guard made four turnovers, and they have been shooting very poorly. We struggle when the ball is in the hands of our guards."

Temple was led by Marc Jackson with 13 points and received some support from Derrick Battie and Lynard Stewart, 12 and 11 points respectively, but was not enough collectively. Their coach afterwards pointed their archrivals as being the consummate team.

"That is a great team. You can't take anything away from that team," Chaney said. "They have all the elements. They have leadership at the guards, a well oiled machine in terms of coaching and all those guys are players. It goes beyond talent, because that is a team, the essence of what a team should be."

The Minutemen return to action on Thursday when they host new Atlantic 10 member LaSalle. Tip–off is at 7:30 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center.

Hawkeyes run Hoosiers out of town

By Chuck Schoffner
Associated Press

IOWA CITY, Iowa — First Indiana got run out of its hotel. Then the Hoosiers got run out of the arena by Iowa.

No. 19 Iowa shut down Big Ten scoring leader Brian Evans and got a big lift from Kenyon Murray off the bench in beating Indiana 76–50 Sunday.

Murray, who asked to be taken out of the starting lineup, led Iowa (17–6 overall, 6–5 Big Ten) with 16 points and got two of his baskets during a 9–0 second–half run that gave the Hawkeyes control.

It was Iowa's most lopsided victory over Indiana since a 91–60 win in 1979. The 50 points were a season–low for the Hoosiers, who shot 34.7 percent and were outrebounded 49–33.

"We came out and played great today," said Iowa's Ryan Bowen. "We knew it was a big game for us, being on national television. We wanted to play well and that's what we did."

Indiana (14–9, 7–4) had all sorts of problems. The Hoosiers went through scoring droughts of 4:53 in the first half and 6:22 in the second and they got into foul trouble, forcing coach Bob Knight to abandon his much–loved man–to–man defense and play zone.

It was a rough weekend all the way around for Indiana, which had to evacuate its hotel Saturday night when a mixing error in the swimming pool caused a release of chlorine gas. The Hoosiers checked into another hotel one hour, 15 minutes later.

Iowa coach Tom Davis felt the interruption in routine may have hurt Indiana. Knight disagreed.

"That didn't have anything to do with us," he replied brusquely. "Any questions on the game?"

Knight had little else to say in a postgame press conference that lasted two minutes at the most.

"Our inside people did not play well," he said. "We got outrebounded badly. We just did not see things very well as the second half progressed. It was a game that the more we got into it, the more thoroughly we were beaten."

Iowa overcame 28.6 percent first–half shooting with defense and rebounding to win for the second time in as many games without starting guard Chris Kingsbury, suspended for three games for unsportsmanlike behavior.

Russ Millard added 15 points for the Hawkeyes and Andre Woolridge scored 14 to go with nine assists. Jess Settles had 10 points and 11 rebounds.

"Even if Chris had been in there, we needed to come out in the second half of the [Big Ten] season and just play hard," Murray said. "We weren't happy with how we finished the first half. We got back to basics. We're working hard out there and we're having fun."

Shawnta Rogers, GW's small wonder

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Years from now, legend may have it that the snowdrifts outside the Smith Center were higher than Shawnta Rogers' head on the night he made his home debut at George Washington University.

It wouldn't be far from the truth. For while most Washingtonians were digging out through the 5–foot banks from one of the city's worst blizzards this century, some 1,500 hardy fans were watching 5–foot–3 Rogers scoot up and down the court, leap on the scorer's table to save a ball, and grab an incredible team–high eight rebounds in an 87–78 victory over St. Bonaventure.

Rogers got the first of many standing ovations on that Jan. 9 night, and the fans haven't stopped clapping since. The Colonials (15–5, 8–1 Atlantic 10) are 11–2 since Rogers joined the team, including a 92–83 victory over La Salle on Saturday that extended the school's winning streak to seven.

"He likes to prove everybody wrong," said George Washington coach Mike Jarvis, whose team is knocking on the door of an NCAA tournament berth. "When the game goes from 10 to 20, he's probably involved in 9 or 10 of the plays. That's what Shwanta gives us, is the potential to have that kind of a run. All of sudden — boom — you look up, you're ahead 10, next thing you know you're ahead 25."

Rogers' height and hometown draw inevitable comparisons to Charlotte Hornets star Tyrone "Muggsy" Bogues. Both hail from Baltimore, which meant Rogers had a natural idol to motivate him when other kids kept saying he was too short to play basketball. "I had to show 'em," Rogers said. "I've always had to prove myself on and off the court. Every game, a guy's going to say, 'Let's post him up. He's not supposed to be out here.' [Bogues] is in the NBA, so I look up to him."

Rogers set the school record for steals (8) in just his fifth game with the Colonials. His 50–foot, fastbreak bounce passes can take your breath away, so it's no surprise he leads the team in assists. However, his no–look feeds and overall pace are so fast that his teammates have had trouble adjusting.

"It's still a matter of getting into the flow," Rogers said. "Because sometimes they act like they don't know what's going on. Sometimes I call a play, and they're not even ready."

Rogers' talent could have taken him to a more prominent basketball school, but uncertainty about his academic status probably kept many recruiters away. After failing to make the required score on the SAT, Rogers was given special dispensation last fall to take the test orally because of a learning disability that causes him to have difficulty reading.

first period. Led by two goals from Daw, the River Hawks opened a 3-0 lead after the first period.

While Mallen acknowledged that he didn't blame the deficit on starting goaltender Dave Kilduff, he elected to bring Brian Regan into the game in hopes of giving his troops a shot of adrenaline.

"It wasn't David Kilduff's fault," Mallen began, "But I just thought we needed to get some adrenaline going. I thought it might give us a change in momentum. Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't but it definitely gave us a boost tonight."

The move worked as seen by two power play goals by Manganaro and an even strength goal by Warren Norris. The Minutemen went into the second intermission with a 3-3 tie.

For the second straight night Regan was spectacular. After a 38-save performance while holding No. 2 Boston University to only four goals in Friday night's 4-1 loss to the Terriers, Regan's 19 saves in two periods plus overtime against the River Hawks were just as impressive.

The two teams traded goals in the third sending the game into overtime.

Boston University 4, Massachusetts 1

While the Minutemen played well, it wasn't enough against the Terriers.

BU opened up a 2-0 lead before Warren Norris put the Minutemen on the board in the second period. The Terriers would add two more unanswered goals in the middle stanza, and neither team would score in the third as BU coasted to a 4-1 win.

terday] he was shooting well, and I was just trying to get him open shots," Padilla said.

When the Owls concentrated on Camby inside in the first half, Travieso made them pay knocking down five treys before the intermission.

"If Marcus is double-teamed, then someone else should be wide open. Marcus and Dana did a good job of finding me, I just spotted up. After the third one, the release felt good. I knew I would have a big night," Travieso said. "Once the first one goes down, that's a big boost. After the second and third, you feel good. Your confidence should be high."

The 6-foot-2-inch junior kept it going in the second half, draining all three treys he attempted.

"When I'm beyond the three-point line, wherever I get the ball, I feel comfortable — anywhere on the court," Travieso said. "It's just a matter of letting the ball go. Coach believes I'm the best shooter on the floor wherever we go. Everybody on the team thinks I'm the best shooter and I just feed off of that. So my confidence is pretty high."

"He's shot the ball well all year," Massachusetts coach John Calipari said.

When it wasn't Travieso knocking down the three-pointer, it was Padilla making a steal or dishing the rock to a teammate. The point guard finished with 13 points, nine assists, six rebounds and a game-high five steals. His nine assists were more than the entire Temple squad came up with for the whole game (eight).

In one span during the first half, the quick-handed Padilla came up with two steals in a little over a minute. Soon after, the 6-foot-2-inch junior almost grabbed a rebound away from Temple's Marc Jackson, who at 6-foot-10, was a force on the boards all game for the Owls, pulling down 11 in the first half alone (14 for the game).

In the second half, it was Padilla who started a UMass fast break with a steal and a pass to a streaking Donta Bright, who scored on a layup, that gave UMass its first 20-point lead of the game.

"[Travieso and Padilla] play well together. They play hard, they pressure the ball well," Calipari said. "I've got the two best guards in the country."

"I believe they are the best [backcourt] in the country," Dingle said. "I enjoy playing with these two guys more than anybody [else] in my career."

Dingle was another Minuteman who made the Owls pay when they focused on Camby. The Bronx native shot 6-of- 11 from the field, including three open jumpers, to finish with 13 points. He also grabbed a team-high eight boards.

Even freshman back-up guard Charlton Clarke got into the act, sinking his only attempt of the game, a three-pointer with 10:41 left in the contest, while playing tough defense throughout the contest.

"This is a great team. This team's got all the elements. They've got good leadership guards and they're a well-oiled machine in terms of their coach," Chaney said. "Every single one of those guys are players."

Kuzmeski–Carroll combination leads UM offense

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

"On any given night in the Atlantic 10, anybody can beat anybody," said Xavier women's basketball coach Melanie Balcomb after her Musketeers fell to the Minutewomen 75– 56 Saturday afternoon. Balcomb didn't realize that UMass didn't have just "anybody" leading their offensive attack, they had Beth Kuzmeski.

Kuzmeski, a junior guard from Northampton was instrumental in the Minutewomen's win over Xavier, leading UMass in scoring in the first half with 14 points and finishing the game with a total of 18.

The first half saw a UMass squad which fought hard to keep pace with the Muskateers. Trailing early, the Minutewomen tied the game at 13 with 11:00 to go in the half, then trailed the rest of the way until they knotted the score once again at 36 in the closing seconds on an Octavia Thomas jumper.

Kuzmeski was instrumental in keeping the game close as she went 4-7 from outside the arc and was the sole Minutewoman to answer Xavier's shooting contest led by Kiesha Brown (10 points) and Amy Siefring (12 points). When UMass was struggling, Kuzmeski got the ball and drained shot after shot keeping the Minutewomen's chance at defending their undefeated home win streak alive.

"She kept us in it in the first half and that allowed everybody else to pick up on their game in the second half," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said.

By the time the second half arrived, Xavier was tired and easily susceptible to the UMass fast break led by Thomas which eventually sealed up the win extending the Minutewomen's record to 15–7, 7–4 in the A–10. The Muskateers just couldn't keep up with the abundance of talent on the UMass squad. Once again, O'Brien used her squad's depth to her advantage, subbing five players at a time if need be. This eventually proved to be the nail in the coffin for Xavier in the second half.

O'Brien said she didn't have a special plan to use Kuzmeski specifically as their offensive threat in the first stanza, but stated that the 5–foot–7 guard has been working hard to improve her shot.

"Today was a time where [Kuzmeski] was able to step up and find her 'won areas' to get in on," O'Brien said. "We didn't really set anything up differently than we have been doing all year. You've got Crystal [Carroll], Octavia, and Melissa [Gurile] out there, the other team is going to be looking to them, that gives Beth some good looks at the basket."

As for Kuzmeski, she says she has been spending time with O'Brien working on her shot and things seemed to fall in place for her on Saturday.

"I've been more confident with my shooting and just feel more comfortable when the ball leaves my hands," Kuzmeski said.

While the standout guard only got off one trey in the second stanza, she was still a driving force in the UMass offensive drive. Rather than lighting up Xavier from the outside, she paired up with fellow junior Crystal Carroll on the inside dishing off several big assists and pulling down a few impressive boards. With the offensive tandem of Gurile and Thomas in its final season, the Kuzmeski–Carroll combination may prove to be a valuable asset in the future.

"Crystal was calling for the ball a little bit in the first half, but I couldn't get her the ball," Kuzmeski said. "In the second, they were guarding me closer so I was able to get her the ball."

Kuzmeski's tear from the outside forced Xavier to drop its 3–2 zone defense which Balcomb said was practiced to combat UMass specifically, to force the Minutewomen to draw the ball away from the strong inside game of Carroll and Gurile. Kuzmeski's three point threat forced Xavier into a tighter man–to–man defense which didn't match up well with UMass.

"We knew their strength is in their excellent post players. We don't have a lot of height to combat that, so we hoped to force them to shoot from the outside," Balcomb said. "Unfortunately, the wrong kid was shooting outside."

Minutemen clinch UMass Alumni Cup with a tie

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The true mark of any great tradition–laden college program is the size of its trophy case.

Boston College's Conte Forum features a new, gigantic trophy case that includes everything from Doug Flutie's Heisman Trophy to last year's Big East field hockey championship cup.

On the third floor of the Mullins Center one can find four Atlantic 10 basketball championship trophies, and a slew of awards commemorating championships in events like the Great Alaska Shootout and Rainbow Classic.

With the exception of a cup awarded for winning the 1972 ECAC Division II championship, the only things in the hockey section of the case that would set off an airport metal detector are the skates in an exhibit commemorating the history of the sport at Massachusetts.

The trophy case is about to become more cluttered, as UMass' hockey history took a giant step forward Saturday night when the team came back from a 3–0 deficit to tie No. 10 UMass–Lowell claiming the inaugural UMass Alumni Cup, annually awarded to the winner of the season series.

UMass–Temple was not the only ferocious rivalry brewing in Mullins this weekend as the blossoming UMass—UMass– Lowell rivalry drew to a conclusion this weekend with each team previously winning one game apiece.

The rivalry became amplified with a piece of hardware at stake. The teams were not merely playing for mythical bragging rights, there was a tangible prize at stake.

As the season series came down to a sudden–death shootout, the vociferous crowd rose to its feet, chants of, "We want a cup" filled the arena.

After Sal Manganaro slid his Cup–clinching shot under Martin Fillion's left pad, the crowd erupted, leading NESN's Bob Norton to comment that the folks in Amherst seemed as if they had just won the Stanley Cup.

"That crowd out there tonight was unbelievable," Manganaro said. "They really helped us out there, it was an unbelievable feeling skating down that ice, listening to them scream. That's the kind of support we're looking for and hopefully it will continue into the future."

That crowd had reason to celebrate. While the basketball end of the trophy case is saturated with impressive hardware, the Alumni Cup is the hockey team's first, certainly one to be remembered for a while.

Taking the season series becomes more impressive considering that last year UMass–Lowell dominated its fellow branch of the state university system, winning all three games by a combined score of 20–9. The chances of UMass taking the inaugural award at the start of the season compared to Temple's NCAA tournament hopes are possible, but very unlikely.

After splitting two games in November, UMass–Lowell came to Mullins Saturday night winners of eight in a row, aiming to claim both the cup, and the top spot in Hockey East, with Boston University idle and just two points ahead.

The inexperienced Minutemen were supposed to crumble after falling behind early, but the team refocused, regained its composure and turned in a performance that every player, coach and each of the 3,655 in attendance should be tremendously proud of.

Even coach Joe Mallen doubted whether his team was ready for this sort of heated rivalry before the season.

"I wasn't too excited about getting involved in some sort of cup with the University of Massachusetts at Lowell because I didn't think that we were ready," Mallen said. "I didn't think that our program was developed enough to have a good rivalry."

"When I first proposed it a few years ago Mallen wanted to wait maybe three or four years," said UMass–Lowell coach Bruce Crowder.

"[The rivalry] is fabulous, as long as we can continue to have two very successful programs and compete. Rivalries are only as good as the competition on the ice. When one team is blowing the other out it's not a whole lot of fun."

The inexperienced Minutemen reigned in the first installment of the Alumni Cup, holding off the battle-tested River Hawks. The men's basketball team's Commonwealth Classic Cup now has some company, and as the team continues to rapidly mature, the four A–10 trophies might be joined by four Lamoriello Cups sooner than expected.

the play of guard Amy Siefring. Siefring continually countered the Minutewomen finishing with 15 points for Xavier.

"It seemed like when UMass got on a roll, we couldn't stop them," Xavier coach Melanie Balcomb said. "We just didn't match-up and they took control."

Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Families
Tuesday, February 21, 1996 • 6:30 - 8:00 p.m.
Murray Lincoln Campus Center, UMass
Room 904-08
I think my roommate has an eating disorder. How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help. How can I convince her to see a professional? Who should I suggest.. Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia. She says it's under control, but I don't think it is. I'm really afraid... What can I do to help?
If you are concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

You know Bobby, copying these answers from our family encyclopedia for your exams present reminds me of my college days. Ahh... those were the good ole' days, cheat sheets on the inside of my ivy league mortar board, paying off the students at the state school to take my exams. Gimme Gimme Louie! God bless those enriching entities! I did love them so.

Minutemen humiliate Temple, Travieso ties record

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

When a team loses badly in a rivalry, such as when the Massachusetts men's basketball team embarrassed the Temple Owls in their own building 10 days ago, it's often the case that the losing team comes out and exacts revenge on their nemesis.

Yesterday, the Minutemen would not let that happen.

UMass (23-0 overall, 11-0 Atlantic 10) put together what arguably could be their most complete 40 minutes of basketball so far this year and for the second time this season blew out the Owls (12-10, 8-3), 84-55.

"I'm not sure we can play much better than that," said Massachusetts coach John Calipari. "I hope we squelched all the rumors that we were wearing out. I gave the kids a couple of days off after the seven-day road trip. I think you see their legs are back.

"We're one of those teams that has seen the match-up zone so many times that we're comfortable against it."

Massachusetts	84

The Minutemen used their fresh legs to come out quickly against Temple's match-up zone defense and established a 12-point, 18-6 lead within the first 10 minutes of the game. The early charge was led by Donta Bright who drove the lane for three easy baskets. The senior co-captain finished with 13 points and six assists.

UMass extended its biggest lead of the half to 14 when Carmelo Travieso hit his fifth trey with just over two minutes remaining before Temple went on an 8-1 run to close out the half, climbing to within 7 at 36-29.

The junior guard led the way for the Minutemen with 26 points on 9-for-12 shooting from the field. Eight of

Backcourt too tough, Travieso ties record

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

When a team plays the Massachusetts men's basketball team, its plan is usually to try to stop National Player of the Year candidate Marcus Camby, and hope the UMass backcourt has an off day.

That was what Temple tried to do yesterday. The Owls shut down Camby (1-for-7 first-half shooting, 3-for-9 overall) for much of the game, but UMass' backcourt made them pay.

It was the hot shooting from Carmelo Travieso and the outstanding overall play by Edgar Padilla that helped give the Minutemen their second straight blowout victory over the Owls, 84-55, yesterday at the William D. Mullins Center.

"We wanted to contain Camby and hope the other guys outside would throw up some bricks, but they didn't. They had to hit them [from outside] because we ain't giving up nothing inside," said Temple coach John Chaney. "This is a great team. You can shut down one guy, [but] that doesn't stop a team with balance."

The Owls couldn't stop Travieso.

The Boston native was feeling it from downtown, finishing with eight treys on the day, tying the UMass record for most in a game. His previous high was seven, which he accomplished twice.

"It's nice to tie the record but that's really not important," Travieso said.

"He's just a great shooter and [yes-

Women crush Xavier, still perfect on the court

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

The Magic of the William D. Mullins Center continues for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, as the Minutewomen remain flawless (10-0) on their home court this season.

Saturday afternoon in front of a raucous crowd of 1,775, UMass dispersed of Atlantic 10 foe Xavier 75-56. The Minutewomen improved their record to 15-7, while the Musketeers fell to 12-9.

Massachusetts	75

see related story page 9

In the second half of action, the Minutewomen put on a show with a textbook defensive effort. The Musketeers were only able to muster 20 points, enabling UMass to run away with the game.

"I think our defense in the second half was as good as it has been all year long," said Massachusetts coach Jonnie O'Brien. "We gave up too many uncontested shots in the first half, and our guards did a good job of cutting penetration in the second half."

Complementing the tenacious defense of the Minutewomen was the play of forward Crystal Carroll. The 6-foot-2-inch junior cleared the path for UMass in the second half pouring in 12 points and tearing down three boards in a 10 minute span.

"Crystal was calling for the ball the whole first half, and I didn't get it to her," junior guard Beth Kuzmeski said. "[Xavier] covered me closely from outside in the second half, so I was able to get her the ball down low."

Dishing the ball with precision for UMass was Kuzmeski. She provided three key assists which resulted in easy buckets in the second stanza. The shooting guard also led all scorers draining 18 points for UMass and was the story of the first half.

A 19-point victory does somewhat constitute a blow-out, however the conclusion of the first half indicated it was anybody's ball game. At the mid-point of the contest, it was all knotted up at 36. Each team exchanged baskets and Xavier looked threatening leading by as many as six, on three different occasions.

The Minutewomen refused to fold, thanks to the three point shooting of Kuzmeski. She nailed four from behind the three point arc, keeping UMass alive.

"Xavier and [Kuzmeski] were having a three-point shooting contest, so she kept us even in the first half," O'Brien said. "She has been shooting the ball really well the last few weeks and she got some good looks. I'm pretty confident that when the ball leaves her hands, it has a pretty good shot at getting in."

Senior co-captain Melissa Gurile also helped the UMass cause chipping in with eight first-half points. She would finish with 13, to go with nine rebounds. The Musketeers were able to maintain respectability, due to

Hockey beats Lowell in shootout

By Matt Vautour

When the idea of the Alumni Cup, the trophy for the winner of the season series between Massachusetts and UMass-Lowell, was proposed to Minuteman coach Joe Mallen, he was skeptical.

But when Sal Manganaro beat goaltender Martin Fillion, in the shootout Saturday night, to clinch the 5-4 UMass shootout victory and the first ever Alumni Cup, Mallen may have changed his mind.

"I wasn't too excited about getting involved in a cup with UMass-Lowell because I didn't think we were ready," he said. "But when we won the second game at Lowell, I thought we had a shot."

The game goes into the record books as a tie, with UMass getting one extra point for the shootout win, but capturing the Alumni Cup caused a jubilant celebration on the ice for the Minutemen.

"It's great to be able to get a few more points from obviously a very good team," Manganaro said. "UMass entered the shootout with a loss in its only previous shootout, but this time was different. After each team scored three times in the five-man set, the game moved to a sudden death shootout.

Brendan Concannon beat Brian Regan to put the pressure on Rob Bonneau. The junior forward responded by beating Martin Fillion. When Regan denied Jeff Daw, it set the stage for Manganaro's heroics.

"I wasn't feeling much of anything," he said. "I was kind of numb. You bear down, try to make your move and hopefully you beat them. Thankfully I did."

Manganaro thanked the crowd following the game.

"I don't know what the attendance was, but that was an unbelievable crowd to play in front of," he said. "It was an unbelievable feeling skating down the ice at the end of the game, listening to them scream."

After the game, the Minutemen sung the praises of the institutions of shootouts.

"I love it," Regan said. "It's great to have a game with an ultimate winner. It's exciting for the fans. It's exciting for the game, and it's very exciting for the players involved."

Lowell coach Bruce Crowder lauded what the game would do for the rivalry.

"You couldn't ask for a better situation, with this Alumni Cup," he said. "I think [the rivalry] is fabulous. As long as we continue to have two very successful programs that compete... rivalries are only as good as the competition on the ice."

The tie brought the UMass record to 10-16-2 (4-13-2 in Hockey East) while the loss snaps Lowell's (19-6-4, 13-5-2) winning streak at eight games. The Minutemen return to action this weekend with a home and home series with New Hampshire.

To get to the overtime, the Minutemen had to overcome a tough

Review Program geared to consolidation

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Upon the mandate of the Board of Trustees, Provost Patricia Crosson has developed an Academic Review Program according to four criteria — cost, demand, quality and centrality.

"Not only is the review a product of the mandate, it is also in the best interest of the campus," Crosson said. "We [the University of Massachusetts at Amherst] have gone through a decade of consistently losing resources, yet we still have all of the same departments. We have stretched ourselves too thin and now we need to focus."

The provost used departmental self-assessments, school and college plans, departmental profiles and one page supplements to make the necessary judgements. Initially the departments have been categorized into two groups: those identified for stable or increased resources and those identified for resource reductions. Crosson then divided the latter group into three categories — consolidate/restructure, reduce by attrition, or stop admissions to the undergraduate or graduate program.

"We used a multimeasure approach because of the difficulty of representing complex concepts such as quality and centrality with single quantitative indicators," stated Crosson in a document released by on Dec. 15, 1995 to the faculty and the undergraduate and graduate Student Government Associations, "because of inherent differences across disciplines and fields of study in pedagogy as well as forms of scholarship and research; and because different departments contribute in different ways to the multi-faceted campus mission."

All 64 of the campus departments have been evaluated; 19 appear in one or more of the reduction categories.

Within the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, art history would be consolidated with art; Asian languages and literatures may be placed into a Five-College or five campus major in Japanese and/or Chinese; in French and Italian, admissions to the French Ph.D. would be stopped; Judaic and Near Eastern Studies will be consolidated with the history department; and admissions will be stopped to Slavic languages and literatures.

The major change within the language department will be a shift in first and second year language instruction into a program with the Center for the Study of Language Acquisition (CSLA). Faculty members and teaching assistants from the language departments will continue to be involved with the teaching of these courses.

"The arrangement will make it possible for the campus to be more flexible in responding to changes in student demand," Crosson said.

The president of the Graduate Student Senate stated that the provost's review program will cause a major loss in cultural diversity.

In response, Crosson states, "I do not believe that anything within my report is designed to somehow minimalize multiculturalism or diversity, which is a strong aspect of the campus mission."

Three departments within the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics are scheduled to be consolidated or restructured. Biochemistry and molecular biology will be merged with chemistry or biology. Mathematics and statistics will be coordinated with a proposed University Statistics Program (USTAT), which would coordinate statistics instruction across a broad range of disciplines. Microbiology will be transferred to the College of Food and Natural Resources.

The Labor Relations and Research Center (LRRC) is the only department in the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences which will change.

"The department [LRRC] needs to Police investigate Friday assault

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police are currently investigating an assault on a female victim that took place early Friday morning. Police said the assault probably took place within a building on North Pleasant Street in or near Sorority/Fraternity Row.

Police believe more than one person was involved in the assault on the woman. It is currently unknown whether any weapons were used in the incident. The police are refusing to reveal the victim's identity.

The woman was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for injuries sustained during the attack. She was treated and released from the hospital.

Michael Wiseman, the director of Greek Affairs, said he was only recently informed of the event that happened sometime after midnight early Friday morning. He confirmed that an incident took place, but did not know specifics about the event. He was unable to give any details because he did not want to compromise the investigation.

University of Massachusetts Police were not dispatched to the scene since the incident took place off campus.

Amherst Police are currently interviewing witnesses. The initial process of seeking witnesses and information is going well. Police are asking that anyone with any information call the Amherst Police Station. Police are willing to take anonymous phone calls in order to assist in the investigation.

As the Collegian went to press, a description of the attackers, the exact time of the incident and the place of the attack had not been released. Due to legal constraints, the police are unable to give the particulars of the incident until the investigation is finished.

Secrets of spider silk unraveled

Within the polymer science and engineering laboratories at the University of Massachusetts, professors are in the process of developing a technique to synthesize one of the strongest fibers in the world — spider silk.

Dragline silk is the fiber from which spiders construct their webs. It has been estimated by scientists that the fiber is at least five times as strong as steel, twice as elastic as nylon, is waterproof and stretchable.

Dragline spider silk is actually stronger than Kevlar synthetic fiber and Kevlar is several times stronger than steel, said University Barrett Professor of Polymer Science and Engineering David Tirrell. Spider silk stretches five times as far as Kevlar before it breaks, he added.

Researchers have yet to come up with anything as strong and elastic as "dragline" spider silk, Tirrell said in the latest issue of Science.

"The properties of spider silk have inpressed naturalists for thousands of years," Tirrell said, "but until recently we couldn't begin to think of making it in the lab. The advent of modern biotechnology has finally given us the tools to study the molecular design of spider silk fiber, — and the means for replicating natural spider silk in the lab using established recombinant DNA techniques."

Researchers are now able to make copies of the spider silk gene or small variations since part of the gene sequence of spider silk is now known.

University professors are trying to mimic the process in which spiders and silk worms take aqueous solutions of silk to create dragline spider silk that is no longer soluble in water.

"We want to develop polymer fibers with the least amount of undesirable byproducts," said Shaw Ling Hsu, professor of polymer science and engineering.

Hsu focuses his research on finding one crystallized structure of spider silk that is responsible for the desirable mechanical properties and its shimmery appearance. Such mechanical properties of spider silk include strength because of it's crystaline structure, elasticity, high resistance to abrasion and a macroscopic triangular shape that shim-

Afro–American lesbians face unique challenges

By Lisa Plantefaber
Collegian Correspondent

African-American lesbians are in "triple jeopardy" from racism, sexism and heterosexism, according to Beverly Green, in a talk entitled "African American Lesbians: Mental health and psychotherapy issues" given last Thursday.

Presented as part of the Stonewall Center's weekly Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender Studies Lecture Series at UMass, Green, a clinical psychologist, professor of Psychology at St. John's University and author of several books on the psychology of ethnicity and gender, discussed the unique psychological problems faced by African American Lesbians and the challenges that they present to mental health practitioners.

Research has shown that African-American lesbians differ from their white counterparts. They are more likely to maintain close ties with their families, more likely to have children, more likely to be in an interracial relationship and less likely to seek help from psychotherapists. In working with African-American lesbians, psychotherapists must understand how the dominant culture and the

SGA, SCERA fight UMass over money

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

As the March 1 budget deadline approaches for all Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), available funds are once again in short supply — a dilemma which the Student Government Association and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) believe to have been caused by the University.

Money is made available to all RSOs through the Student Activity Trust Fund (SATF), the only financial resource of its kind controlled directly by students — through the SGA.

Amounting to a total of $1.7 million, the SATF is paid for by all undergraduates via the student activities fee that appears on each semester bill.

Of the $1.7 million, however, approximately $450,000 is either taxed by the University or mandated to be spent on services such as the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) Bus System and the Five-College Bus.

SGA and SCERA, in efforts to inform all RSOs where their potential funds are directed, are holding a informational meeting tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge at 7 p.m. to begin organizing campus-wide in protest of University policy.

"RSOs and agencies are the lifeblood of this campus," said SGA Secretary of Finance Sean Carter. Additional money made available by a unrestricted SATF would greatly enhance quality of life at the university and increase students ability to organize, he added.

The meeting will provide RSOs with the details they need to bring their collective message to the University. According to Carter, a cooperative struggle will prove instrumental if students are to succeed.

"We don't want it coming just from the SGA," Carter said. Carter said that he wants RSOs to make clear to the University what the SATF was intended for — student activities.

Carter said that the University has confused student activities with student services, which explains the conflict over funding for the PVTA and the Five College Bus.

Approximately $318,500 of the SATF is spent for those transportation costs, amounting to about $20 per student each year.

Both of these services, said Carter, are "vital," to the daily functions of the University, and thus should not be financed through activities fees.

More troubling to Carter is the full-costing tax, which totals $127,000 a year. Increased by $30,000 in 1995, he said that the University is simply "skimming off the top" of the SATF.

Despite negotiations with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson, "no fruit has been born from our discussions," said Carter, to reduce or eliminate full-costing.

"They are not willing to give up any of their money," Carter said.

The disagreement over interest collected by the SATF may further escalate this conflict and result with the SGA, SCERA and the University in court. Currently, all interest earned by the SATF is not returned to the trust — some $75,000 a year, by order of the Board of Trustees.

According to Carter, this policy violates the law.

"If something is poured into a trust fund, it can only be used with that trust," Carter said. A law suit, recommended by SGA attorneys, "will be quite a shock to them."

The SGA has been fighting this policy for eight years. Carter anticipates a victory for the students.

If changes are to be made in terms of who controls the SATF, "we need a lot of student support," said Carter.

Carter said that he advises all students involved with RSOs and agencies on campus to attend.

Panel discusses NATO in Bosnia

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

The implications of the NATO deployment of ground forces into the war in Bosnia are far-reaching and complex. Such was evidenced by a Five-College panel discussion Thursday night at Hampshire College.

The panel included Vincent Ferraro of Mount Holyoke College, Pavel Machala of Amherst College and Eqbal Ahmad of Hampshire College.

Ferraro, a professor of international relations, supports the American-lead NATO involvement in the Balkans, as the war has "reached rather horrific proportions," in five years.

While the Dayton peace accords signed by all warring parties do not fulfil Ferraro's prescribed remedies for the conflict, is does provide a opportunity for peace.

"The evidence is clear that the US wanted to take a stronger role," in creating peace in Bosnia — a role which, according to Ferraro, has real potential.

A significant obstacle still remaining, however, for US involvement is that of a lack of support amongst the American people for the mission, said Ferraro.

"They do not enthusiastically support this intervention," Ferraro said. Their tone is "strongly negative," he added.

Nevertheless, NATO's military policy in Bosnia is firm, said Ferraro.

"The NATO forces have a very clear understanding of how their mission is limited," Ferraro said, as their orders are specifically designated to enforce established armistice lines, intended to prevent their military and perhaps even political role from expanding.

Machala, a professor of political science, views the intervention through a considerably more skeptical lens, relative to Ferraro — and finds the Dayton agreement deeply flawed and counterproductive.

Reasons for American involvement "are about the next Presidential elections," said Machala. "It is a cynical ploy by President Clinton to secure a second term."

"Like in Somalia, the U.S. will leave after President Clinton is re-elected," Machala said.

The self-imposed one year time limit for the United States mission will "merely post-pone the slaughter," said Machala.

The U.S., Machala said, lacks clarity on the issue of the war in Bosnia, failing to understand it from a complex, historical perspective.

"The Bosnian Serbs were not villains," Machala said, as the Bosnian Muslims were not "victims." Both sides are equally responsible for "elements of genocide."

Machala said that allowing for a sudden, decisive Bosnian Serb victory would be the most efficient and sustainable way to end the war.

Ahmad, a professor of political science, agreed with Machala that the Dayton agreement was not the solution

Local forum looks at race relations

By Brian Lee
Collegian Correspondent

The first Community Action Forum forum on accessing resources on race and racism was held in the Campus Center yesterday.

Hosted by Jethro Heiko, Aaron Piziali and Phillip Copeland, the forum was comprised of students, faculty and staff members from UMass. The meeting was divided into three segments.

During the first segment, everyone introduced his or herself and discussed what he or she hoped to accomplish from the meeting.

The second part served as an information session, where various program representatives provided information. The panel learned about teams from program director Kasey McCollum. The program is a three credit community service project that focuses on race in education.

The audience was also given information on the Everywoman's Center. Carrol Wallace discussed many topics including rape crisis and bilingual internships.

Richard Ford, of the training and development program spoke of the need for employees on campus to be educated on racism. The program offers several workshops, but most employees do not take advantage of the program. Of the 5,500 employees at UMass, Ford estimates that about 500 utilize the facility.

Human Relations Director Grant Ingle, told the audience that his program, housed in Middlesex House, offers data on race relations on campus.

Other speakers, from Education 210, "Social Diversity in Education," and women's studies encouraged students to take courses that emphasize diversity. Women's studies also wanted to combat the notion that the curriculum focuses on "white women's studies."

In the final segment, everyone was invited to present their own personal ideas. Ingle spoke of the need for "more discussions on race topics. Budget cuts (within the University) have made it harder for faculty to initiate these forums."

Mercedes Hernandez, a public health major added, "The people that need this type of training don't go. We need to make it mandatory."

develop greater collaboration with other departments on campus to broaden the base for, and consequently strengthen, the graduate program," Crosson said.

Industrial engineering and operations research, a department of the College of Engineering, will be merged with mechanical engineering to form a new department of mechanical and industrial engineering.

Within the College of Food and Natural Resources, undergraduate admissions will be stopped to entomology, food science and plant pathology. Admissions will also be stopped to the graduate program of consumer studies. Action will be suspended on the new Ph.D. program of the department of hotel, restaurant and travel administration. The size of the faculty of plants and soil sciences will be reduced. Plant pathology will be consolidated with microbiology and entomology will be merged with some other department.

Marketing, a department of the School of Management, will receive a modest reduction in faculty.

"Costs continue to be above average, contributions to instruction are below average, and demand is falling. Therefore, gradual and selective faculty reduction will be done through attrition," Crosson said.

Nutrition is considered to be merged with exercise science while admissions to the master's and doctoral programs of the School of Public Health and Health Sciences department will be stopped.

"No students currently in the programs will be affected," stated the provost. "The completions of majors will not be stopped."

No final actions or decisions will be made concerning Crossons' Academic Review Program until the Faculty Senate has responded to it.

African- American culture shape a person's ethnic, gender and sexual identity, according to Green.

As African-Americans, African-American lesbians are victims of racism in the dominant American culture. Racist stereotypes may become internalized and influence self- image, the choice of partners and the relationship with that partner. As women, African-American lesbians are subject to sexism from outside and inside the African-American community. Because of slavery and later economic discrimination, African-American women have historically not fit the dominant stereotype of women as weak and dependent.

Sexism and racism work together to reinforce negative images of African-American women in general and lesbians in particular. Green said, "Males in the culture are encouraged to believe that strong women are really responsible for their oppression, not racist institutions" increasing the stigmatization of lesbians who do not conform to traditional gender roles. As lesbians, they are seen as "defective women" and "an embarrassment to the community."

Traditionally the family provides support against racism and sexism but this often does not extend to heterosexism. Close ties in the family often prevent outright rejection of a lesbian family member but "they keep you around to talk you out of it," Green said.

The GLBT Studies Seminar series continues on Feb. 15 with a talk by Selena Whang entitled "Baby You Can Drive My Car: Yellow Cabs, Lesbians of Color and Interracial Third World Desire."

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

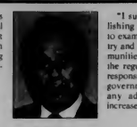
The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Should Washington increase taxes on the gambling industry or impose restrictions on its growth?

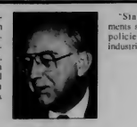
Bill Clinton

Regulation of gambling has been primarily a state and local issue. I support establishment of a national commission which will examine the gambling industry and make recommendations for national policy."



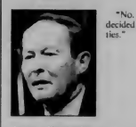
Bob Dole

"I support legislation establishing a national commission to examine the gambling industry and its impact on local communities. As a general matter, the regulation of gambling is a responsibility of state and local government. I do not support any additional federal tax increases."



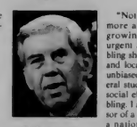
Phil Graham

"States and local governments should decide their own policies towards the gaming industries in their jurisdiction."



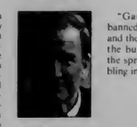
Lamar Alexander

"No. This is an issue to be decided by states and communities."



Richard Lugar

"Not until we know much more about this dynamically growing industry. The most urgent action related to gambling should be to provide state and local governments with an unbiased and authoritative federal study on the economic and social effects of legalized gambling. I am the original co-sponsor of a bill that would establish a national commission to do just that."



Pat Buchanan

"Gambling should be banned on federal property and the president should use the bully pulpit to reverse the spread of legalized gambling in the states."

Valentine's Day to help Jones Library

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Some people prefer to call it the holiday for lovers. Others think it is a phony holiday created by a sadistic greeting card company to make money. However this year, Valentine's Day will raise money for the Jones Library while giving people discounts at 61 local businesses.

The Friends of the Jones Library are selling dollar Valentines at the library. All proceeds go directly toward helping the library. On the back of the Valentine is a list of different stores and the discounts given upon purchase.

"Our mission is to encourage the use of the library and to raise money to spend on materials," said Katie George, a Friend of the Jones Library.

Businesses including several hair stylists, a resume service, book stores, an optician and restaurants are involved in the fund raiser.

"There is something in it for everyone and the dollar goes directly to the library," said Lisa Feldman of the Friends of the Jones Library.

The funds raised will help various library services including the summer reading and the children's music experience series. Last summer, the reading program included over 500 children, Feldman said.

The Friends will buy books for students unable to afford the costs and set up instrumental concerts. Children are introduced to many different types of music through the series, from country music to African rhythms.

"The businesses have been generous and very willing to join the fund raiser," George said. "Everyone loves the library."

Valentines will be sold up to and including Wednesday and can be redeemed through the end of the month.

Money raised through the Valentines will send staff to library conferences. Staff will learn about current technology including multi-media and on-line services. The library will augment its video, cassette tape and compact disk archives. Computer access will enable people to utilize various databases.

The public library houses an extensive amount of children's and popular literature. Amherst's diverse population has a large appetite for reading. The Jones library circulated over 400,000 items in 1994 for a population of 34,605 residents, Feldman said.

Programs designed for adults are offered through the library. A popular series educated people about numerous types of foods will be repeated. Restaurant owners, chefs and food writers led informational lectures.

The Jones Library was designed to look like a comfortable house. The atmosphere offers a unique intimacy for the staff and users, Feldman said.

"The library has a warm homey feeling," George said.

Generation next

I was driving with my little sister to go see a movie. She turned to her radio station and I like to listen to mine. Hers mainly consists of stuff that I heard at an eighth grade dance. After a while of channel surfing upon one of those "80s" stations, you know, Flock of Seagulls, The Tubes, The Knack, REO Speedwagon, Whitesnake, Sniper, Men at Work, The Cars, Guess Survivor, Lionel Ritchie, Run DMC, Th. Fatboys, Cyndi Lauper, Naked Eyes, Boys Mudcrutch, Romeo Void, The Bangles. Pick a song from any one of those bands and that's what was on the radio.

She turns to me and says, I guess as God "I hate oldies music."

Oh. Yes it is again Oldies.

You have to be kidding me. She honestly thinks the stuff we used to listen to in junior high school is oldies. Should I be shopping for a trapper and buying Grecian formula?

If you actually tune into an oldies station you'd be relieved to know that they're still playing the stuff our parents listen to. But my point got me thinking — what are the oldies stations going to sound like?

"You're tuned to Oldies 104

Tim White

This next tune is a blast from the past, an oldie but a goodie, here's Green Day with "Geek Stink Breath."

Imagine one of your grandparents driving 35 mph down the Mass Pike and listening to Alanis Morsette sing "And are you thinking of me when you [bleep] her?"

What kind of older generation are we going to be? I can't see Michael J. Fox promoting Muesli or Depends.

The cable network TNT, now famous for showing classic movies, will be playing Indecent Proposal, Menace II Society and Showgirls in our silver years.

I have a feeling we will be a different older generation. It takes a lot more to shock us today, and we already do a lot to shock our parents. Some people get tattoos or pierce their nipple/ear/belly button/lip/eyebrow/nose and then connect it all with one long chain. So what are our kids going to do to shock us?

"Look Ma, I had my large intestines moved into my nasal cavities ... come on, it's the hip thing to do."

Maybe, instead of each generation getting progressively rougher, our kids will flashback to other decades. Kind of like a lot of people who are going back to the '60s and '70s style today.

Maybe records and 8-tracks will be popular again someday. Our kids might be pegging their pants again, or better yet swinging with some groovy bell-bottoms.

I think there is no other choice but to re-run styles and trends over and over — we're just running out of stuff to do. I worry about that sometimes, how do we keep getting new songs, movies and TV shows out there? One day, writers are going to throw up their arms and say "It's all been done before, I'm drained."

Can you tell I have a severe fear of aging?

I will not age gracefully myself. I'm always going to drive as fast as I can, avoid Florida, drink canned "Boost" and not drive cars that could be mistaken as part of a small flotilla. I think I'll be a dirty old man — just as a hobby.

As soon as I start hearing Madonna on the oldies stations, I'll throw in the towel. I just cannot see our generation following the mold of past generations. We're too different, too weird, too Generation X.

It's really not us getting older that scares me. It's what our offspring are going to be like.

Suddenly I don't feel so good.

Does anyone have some bran? I feel irregular.

See John run

Mark McGrath

This election year the most engaging election in the country outside of the presidential one will likely be the race for Senator right here in the state of Massachusetts. It could even be more important than the presidential race because both candidates hold relative clout and are on the cutting edge of their respective parties politics.

Because of its importance, a national spotlight will be fixed on the race, keeping it in plain view of not only us, the residents of Massachusetts, but the whole country. This race if all goes as it should, will signal an end to the resurgence of the Republican party and insure a new generation of Democratic rule in Washington.

The combatants, John Kerry and William Weld, are similar in the way that they are both closer to moderate than to the hard liners in their respective parties. The issue that seems to loom over the contest is that of the size of government and the role it should play. Kerry believes that government has a role to play and thinks that it can be done at its present size. Weld is in favor of downsizing government and cutting programs provided by it.

While Weld has had reasonable success in getting his measures passed to this point, his luck has run out. In the election look for Kerry and government to bounce back as Massachusetts voters show their distaste for Weld's liberal playing and conservative spending. Weld's previous victories are misleading and for many reasons, he will be unable to ride his wave of previous popularity to victory against Kerry.

The first reason why Weld will not make it through this election is because the state of Massachusetts as a whole now knows his reputation as a tinkerer. He likes to play around with the established order, but rarely stays around to see how his changes turn out. The clearest example of this can be seen in his overhaul of the state government last fall. A change so dramatic that one might think that Weld would want to oversee it for at least a couple of years. It took him only three weeks after the revamp to decide that he was bored and wanted to play with something else, throwing his hat into the senatorial ring.

Kerry, on the other hand, has been steady in his philosophy and has showed a definite seriousness of purpose throughout his political career. He has reluctantly identified himself as a moderate and prefers not to be labeled as anything.

One thing we know about Kerry is that he has been interested in politics since he was 8-years-old and actually gave a speech supporting John F. Kennedy when he was only 16. That's the stuff that legends are made of. Now, 36 years later, he still holds many of the same views and is the model of a man dedicating his life to what he believes in.

Weld sees the senatorship as a mere stepping stone to greater positions. For years, it has been reported that he has had his sights set on Washington and that big white house on Pennsylvania Ave. Why? No one is sure. Many are convinced that Mr. Weld likes to look at politics as an adventure. Washington being his Everest and the presidency its peak. He's a gamer and a risk taker. That is the only way to explain his taking on Kerry, a firmly entrenched Democrat in a traditionally Democratic state. He wants a political thrill.

The problem with his philosophy is that once he loses, which he will, his higher aspirations will be pulled from his reach. Kerry matches up very well with Weld, especially in matters of character and experience. Weld might have been better off taking on Bill Clinton than Kerry.

While Kerry was over in Vietnam winning medals for bravery in battle, Weld was home with a bad back, or was it a bulging bank account? Those Bills just have a way of weaseling their ways out of that war. While that may not have prevented Clinton from winning the big presidency, he was taking on an unpopular incumbent at a turning point in American politics. Kerry, unlike George Bush, has been a model of consistency and has never been more important to or more appreciated by the people of Massachusetts. If voters stick to the "If it ain't broke..." philosophy, then Weld doesn't stand a snowball's chance in his own personal hell of winning, and that will mean curtains on his political career.

I think the key question is whether the Republican ship will throw a life to save their drowning sailor in the form of the vice-presidential nomination. Weld is the poster boy for the New Republicans and if the Massachusetts senatorial race is any indication of the future, they may just want to pull him out as quickly as possible. But given his lofty ambitions and his tendency to bite off more than he can chew, I'd have to say they'll let him drown and suffer two more years as the lowly Governor of Massachusetts before the voters deliver the final blow. Good-bye Bill.

...and the world smiles with you

Dawn Jennings

When all of us are being asked to make positive changes in our lives. We're supposed to be losing fat and gaining fruits and vegetables, actually keeping up a regimen even, we program, and of course, I'm no exception. As long as we're all busy making Greenpeace and saving our planet? But to keep a paper watch TV or read a magazine, you'll see what I mean. It's no wonder we often feel overwhelmed by all these transformations we must make to become better people.

However, what I look at you today is very easy to do. It doesn't involve any big time commitment (no year of service like the Peace Corps) and it doesn't cost a penny (unlike all the high-priced gym memberships). It's very effective expending very little effort. What I ask of you is simply to smile. Try it now. If you're feeling a little self-conscious, hide behind the paper. Some of you might even be brave enough to attempt smiling at someone you probably feel better just by doing it. It's amazing what a smile can do both for the recipient and the provider. Think about how many times you've been having a little blue and just the simple gesture from a friend or acquaintance makes by smiling at you gave you a little mood lift. Just to know that some one else cares about you means a lot. Others of course the smile is followed by, "Do you wanna buy a used car?"

Most likely you can also recall back to a time when you received a sincere smile. Didn't you feel great afterwards? Or, it might have had a positive effect on that person's day. It doesn't count if you're at Time Out and you can't find a hook up for the night.

The reason I even have to be someone you know. I remember one night last semester I got in a huge fight with my roommates. I left our apartment to go to the library or so I initially, but instead I ended up spending most of the time crying because I was so upset. Unfortunately my professor didn't buy this excuse at the time as to why I failed the exam). It was getting late, I had class and I still had a ton of work to do. After I left I decided I'd stop at Dunkin' Donuts on the way home for some coffee. Approaching the counter, I was passed by this guy who gave me a big smile. Of course I had to smile back, and you know what, suddenly I felt much better. I was still in a bad mood, but just knowing that a complete stranger was conveying the message to me that everything would eventually be all right was very uplifting. So in case you're reading this, complete stranger thank you.

It really makes me sad to walk around this campus when people aren't smiling. Many times I'll be walking to classes and I'll pass by numerous other students who seem so unhappy. It's depressing. So we don't have the luxury of leaving English class and being able to greet one another on a sunny California beach that same afternoon. It could be worse (Alaska comes to mind). You almost want to go up and shake some people and say, "What is so wrong with your life that you have to be walking around with a scowl on your face all the time?" Don't be one of these people. (Going to 9:05's on Fridays are the exception.)

Everyone always smiles when they see a baby and what does the baby do in return? It smiles right back. Now why can't we show this affection towards other adults? Is it because we're afraid someone won't smile back? True on occasion, this might happen.

There are some Scrooges out there that can't be bothered to smile back, your calculus professor might be one. But your can't let this stop you. If someone doesn't smile back what's the worst thing that happens? They don't smile back. You haven't wasted any time and frankly, it's their own loss. If they want to be negative then they're the ones that are missing out in life, not you. However these people are definitely the exception rather than the rule and usually it's only because you've caught them before they've had their morning coffee.

The best thing about smiles, and good moods in general, is that they are often contagious. When someone smiles at me I'm very likely to smile at the next person I see, who in turn probably smiles at the next person they see. So I want you to put down the paper with a smile on your face. Smile as you walk across campus. Smile at the people you know that pass by and smile at the ones that you don't. You never know but by smiling at someone you might really brighten up their day, and your own for that matter. Just think, if we all start smiling now, by noon everyone on campus might be smiling, by dinner we might have affected all of Amherst, and who knows what could happen in a weeks time. This might even be our solution to the environmental problem.

Well, maybe not.

Di–versity or Uni–versity?

Andrew Trodden

There should not be a single student here at UMass that isn't aware that much of the pride we have in our school comes from the high level of diversity of it's students. In fact, UMass virtually wears this diversity as a pendant for all others to see and marvel at. To fully appreciate this diversity we must all become aware that the word itself is a diverse word. It encompasses much more than just racial and ethnic diversity.

I have been informed by a very reliable source that an idea for an all first year students dorm has been placed on the table (whatever table that may be). Now I ask you, is this not a restriction of diversity? After all the simple difference of age and experience does create a certain amount of diversity, albeit relatively small and intangible diversity.

Let's be reasonable here, a large portion of a student's first year is spent learning about life, and who better to aid them in that journey then someone who's already been through it. Being influenced by someone a little older and a little wiser is certainly more beneficial than being surrounded by a group of people all in the same boat as you.

First year students deserve the chance to be exposed to this type of diversity as much as any other kind. To take that away from them is to strip them of the very thing that UMass prides itself on. Is this not being hypocritical? I believe it is. I believe it to also be much more than that.

I feel that by ignoring the fact that diversity entails so much more, the university is inadvertently saying that diversity is nothing more than the visible diversity we see every day. I have a tendency to see this as a minute form of prejudice.

Isn't our goal to reach a point where we can all live as one people? Is it wrong to assume that by constantly being made aware that these differences exist that we will never fully be able to achieve the type of society that we so intensely strive for? To preach diversity is to suggest that we live diversely. Is that really the proper message to lead us towards our final goal? Shouldn't we live more as a united whole, where we are as one regardless of what color you are or where you come from.

We will always know that there are many types of skin color and many different backgrounds but that doesn't mean that it should be anything out of the ordinary. Once we can begin to see others simply as fellow humans we will grow that much closer to the goal of complete unity. And how can we do that? By not creating such a furor by saying that there is such a large diversity among us. Confusing, I know.

I in no way intend to make it seem as though I feel diversity is a bad thing. It isn't. The utility it serves is immeasurable. The influences and experiences that can be shared are things that could not be learned any other way. Herein lies the problem with constantly stating that diversity exists. It basically states that we are different, which at the same time creates an invisible wall that must be knocked down for these interactions to occur. If we can all be made to feel that there are no differences among us the sharing of ideas will not be impeded by this wall. Any clearer?

This is why such things like having a dorm with all first year students is a bad idea. Because a dorm in which there is a wider range of ages is a clear example of how something can be effectively diverse without those involved even being aware of this diversity. So to take that away will only serve to make our awareness of diversity ever more present, i.e. build another wall.

I'll say it as plain as I can get it. United we stand and divided we fall. If we ever wish to truly stand as one we must fully unite, or else we shall almost certainly fall.

Mandela : Six years of freedom.

ROBBEN ISLAND, South Africa (AP) — Celebrating the sixth anniversary of his freedom, President Nelson Mandela returned Sunday to the island prison where he spent most of his 27 years as a prisoner of the former apartheid government.

"This was my home for 18 years," Mandela told the visiting Norwegian prime minister, stopping in front of one of the 6-by-8 cells on Robben Island.

Mandela used the occasion to thank Norway — as well as Cuba and Libya — for supporting his African National Congress while he was detained or imprisoned from 1962 to 1990.

Mandela walked out of prison on Feb. 11, 1990, to launch the negotiations with apartheid leaders that eventually made him South Africa's first black president.

Speaking from the quarry where he smashed limestone for years, damaging his eyes, Mandela said Cuban leader Fidel Castro, Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi, the former Soviet Union and Scandinavian, African and Asian nations "rallied around the liberation movement in this country."

"It is through that support that we are in power today," Mandela said. "We will never renounce our friends, no matter how unpopular they may be."

Mandela said he was thinking of inviting a visit from Gadhafi, whom the United States accuses of harboring terrorists. Mandela already has invited Castro to come to South Africa this year.

Strong ties with Cuba and Libya could strain relations with the United States, though no serious dispute seems likely. South Africa and the United States have set up a joint Cabinet-level committee to facilitate cooperation.

Making one of a few visits to Robben Island since his release, Mandela led Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland through the narrow, lime-green passages of the former isolation section reserved for political prisoners.

Nelson Mandela
ASSOCIATED PRESS

He pointed out the garden where copies of his hand-written memoirs were buried, later to become the basis of the autobiography published last year.

Speaking to about 80 of the 175 remaining prisoners on Robben Island, Mandela urged the men to study, noting some ANC leaders obtained university degrees on Robben Island.

The injustices of apartheid had left some young blacks so frustrated they turned to crime, Mandela said, and now they should try to improve themselves even while doing time.

While Mandela spent the largest part of his 27 years as a political prisoner on Robben Island, his release by former President F.W. de Klerk came from another prison where he was sent in the 1980s.

Mrs. Brundtland announced Sunday that Norway would give $83 million for converting Robben Island after the last prisoners are removed at the end of this year.

The island off Cape Town has been designated a national landmark, and likely will become a museum or tourist attraction and wildlife preserve to protect its penguin colonies, small game and abundant bird life.

Commercialization of the island already has begun, with an announcement Sunday that rocks from the prison quarry accompanied by an authenticating note signed by Mandela can be bought for about $11. Profits will go to a fund for former political prisoners.

Elections in Palestine Yasser Arafat wins victory in a landslide

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip (AP) — Final results from the historic Palestinian elections have been released, confirming PLO leader Yasser Arafat's overwhelming victory.

Arafat won 87.1 percent of the votes for president of the Palestinian legislative council, while members of his Fatah faction won 50 of the 88 seats. With other non-Fatah Arafat allies on the council, Arafat, head of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, will enjoy a strong majority.

Arafat won 87.1 percent of the votes for president of the Palestinian legislative council, while members of his Fatah faction won 50 of the 88 seats. With other non-Fatah Arafat allies on the council, Arafat, head of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, will enjoy a strong majority.

The figures, still subject to appeal, were released late Saturday following widespread complaints of cheating and irregularities during the Jan. 20 elections.

The complaints led to a recount of two ballot boxes in the West Bank town of Ramallah and a Jan. 31 revote at two polling stations in the Gaza Strip. The new list matched results released in recent weeks.

The figures, released in Gaza City by the Central Elections Committee, showed Arafat's vote count dropped slightly from the original 88.2 percent of the votes announced earlier. His only opponent for president, social worker Samiha Khalil, received 9.62 percent of the vote.

While calling the results final, CEC head Mahmoud Abbas said an appeals panel must review dozens of complaints before the commission distributes an official document of victory to each winner.

He did not explain the apparent discrepancy, but said the appeals panel will hold its first session on Sunday in Ramallah.

Arafat's landslide victory has not been contested, although opposition leaders who boycotted the elections contend that voter participation was lower than announced, undercutting Arafat's claim that he won a firm mandate for peace with Israel.

Nabil Abu Irdeineh, Arafat's spokesman, said Saturday that Arafat would be sworn in as the president of the first elected Palestinian governing council on Monday in Gaza.

Louis Farrakhan attends rally in Iran

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan attended a rally marking the 17th anniversary of Iran's Islamic revolution Sunday, and told the crowd their country had become a model religious democracy.

"If America wants the world to be democratic, Iran has had 17 elections," since Islamic leaders overthrew the Shah in 1979, Farrakhan told an enthusiastic crowd in a central Tehran square. "This is a theocracy, but it is also a democracy."

Across Iran, millions of people marched through the streets and attended rallies to mark the anniversary and renew their allegiance to the teachings of the late Ayatollah Khomeini, President Hashemi Rafsanjani, in a rare gesture to a foreign visitor, invited Farrakhan to sit next to him at the pavilion erected for the Tehran rally.

"People here today realize that the hatred of the United States toward us is not the hatred of the American natio but that of the U.S. administration," Rafsanjani said.

Farrakhan arrived at the square with an entourage of more than 30 aides, bodyguards and cameramen. The crowd interrupted his speech with approving chants of Allahu Akhbar — "God is great."

Louis Farrakhan
ASSOCIATED PRESS

"Keep the revolution alive, Imam Khomeini lives. He lives in you. He lives in every believer in Islam," Farrakhan said. Iran's dealings with the United States since its revolution have been fraught with tension over a wide range of issues.

Khomeini — who referred to the United States as "the great Satan" and current Iranian leaders contend that Western policies toward Iran are motivated primarily by anti-Islamic sentiments.

The United States imposed a trade embargo on Iran soon after the revolution and tightened it last year, arguing that Tehran was supporting terrorism and trying to acquire nuclear weapons. Iran denies the charges. Iran also denies charges by conservative Arab monarchies in the Persian Gulf region that it is actively trying to destabilize them by exporting its revolutionary brand of Islam.

Rafsanjani told the crowd that Iran took pride in its "spiritual support" of revolutionary Muslims and the "full backing" it gives them, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

"Let our enemies call this export of revolution, we do not fear this. Spreading the word of God and the Koran is not interference in the affairs of others," he said.

Unrest continues in Tajikistan

By Chris Bird
Associated Press

DUSHANBE, Tajikistan — At night, sudden exchanges of gunfire break the tomb-like stillness of Dushanbe, the capital of Tajikistan, a country beset by army mutinies, clan warfare and an Islamic insurgency. The brief euphoria that followed independence from the Soviet Union four years ago has vanished. Telephones are tapped, the news media are tightly controlled, and people are murdered in mysterious circumstances.

Most of Tajikistan's 5.7 million people keep quiet, trying to cope with poverty, war, hunger and disease. Meanwhile, politicians, clan leaders and military chiefs more or less openly divide what few spoils there are.

After several years of relative calm, tension has again mounted following a military mutiny, an escalation in fighting between the secular government's troops and Islamic guerrillas, and an intensification in clan rivalries.

The embattled president of the remote Central Asian nation, Emomali Rakhmonov, told his countrymen Thursday that the nation was "stabilizing" after mutinous troops grudgingly returned to their barracks.

But continued fighting, which already has claimed at least 40,000 lives, and a catastrophic economic decline mock Rakhmonov's claim. Besides the low pay that government soldiers receive, a key to understanding the mutiny is Tajikistan's complex web of regional clan rivalries.

All the top members of the president's entourage come from his home town of Kulyab in the south of the country, and opponents contend they are enriching themselves at the state's expense.

"It's Kulyabism," said Ibodullo Boimatov, who led one of the two revolts that threatened to bring down Rakhmonov in recent weeks.

Although Boimatov, who is the former mayor of the town of Tursunzade west of Dushanbe, says he supports Rakhmonov, he threatened a repeat performance if the president failed to clear out his Kulyabi friends.

"Kulyabis are everywhere in the government — in the Interior Ministry, the police, the tax inspectorate, everywhere," Boimatov complained in an interview Tuesday.

The next day the president appointed Boimatov as a trade envoy. The choice was significant.

With political power in Tajikistan comes control of cotton — the only cash crop except for contraband opium — and regional leaders like Boimatov have been maneuverin to get a bigger slice of the cotton pie.

While warlords like Boimatov try to undercut Rakhmonov's economic clout, the Islamic opposition has stepped up its attacks on government forces in the fourth year of fighting.

A shaky truce that is monitored by United Nations observers and is up for renewal Feb. 26 is largely ignored by both sides.

The opposition forces are based on rival regional clans but most are financed and equipped by Muslim nations intent on fostering a strict Islamic-based regime in Tajikistan, Western diplomats say.

The guerrillas train and operate out of refugee camps across the border inside Afghanistan, where rival Islamic groups that overthrew a Marxist regime are now fighting among themselves. Several opposition leaders, such as Khodzha Akbar Turanzhonzoda, are based in Iran's capital, Tehran.

With an army mutiny under way in the plains late last month, opposition guerrillas grabbed the chance to step up attacks on government troops in the mountains around Tavildara, east of Dushanbe.

Government forces did not seem to have much will to fight. "The weather is difficult. There's much snow," said one army captain, who would give only his first name, Yusuf. "We have problems with supplies, food."

A sprinkling of Russian officers was scattered through a convoy of reinforcements that headed for Tavildara this past week.

The presence of around 25,000 Russian soldiers in Tajikistan, most of them ostensibly on "peacekeeping" duty, is vital for the survival of Rakhmonov's government.

But Western observers say Russian aid to the Tajik government is overestimated. About 80 percent of "Russian" border troops, mostly the lower ranks, are ethnic Tajiks.

Already saddled with criticism over his handling of the Chechen uprising in southern Russia and facing a presidential election in four months, Russian leader Boris Yeltsin is pressuring Rakhmonov to compromise with the opposition.

Yeltsin is eager to avoid a growing entanglement in Tajik politics, whatever Russian hawks say about the threat of Islamic militancy creeping northward into Muslim regions of Russia and other former Soviet states. Amid the political turmoil, Tajik citizens dare not air their grievances.

Mohyedin Alempour, a widely respected journalist for British Broadcasting Corp., was found dead Dec. 13 near Dushanbe University, a regular dumping ground for corpses. He had bullet wounds in his heart and head. His death, still unexplained, brought the total of murdered Tajik journalists to 34 since independence in 1991. "If they (the government) heard me talking about all this, I'd be slammed in jail," said a young Tajik who identified himself only as Hakim.

Bomb blast in Algeria claims lives of 17

By Rachid Khiari
Associated Press

ALGIERS, Algeria — Two powerful car bombs killed 17 people and wounded 93 others Sunday as bloodshed deepened in this North African nation torn by an Islamic insurgency.

The government, reacting to the widening violence, clamped down by ordering Algerian newspapers to submit reports on terrorism to a government censor.

Seventeen people were killed and 52 injured when a car bomb exploded in the Belcourt quarter of the capital, Algiers, according to official sources.

The bomb exploded as a minibus was passing a heavily guarded building that houses Algerian newspapers Le Soir d'Algerie and l'Opinion and the offices of several independent journalists.

Newspaper employees were among the dead, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity. They did not elaborate, and it was not immediately clear which newspaper may have suffered casualties.

Islamic militants began intentionally targeting journalists as enemies of Islam in May 1993, and 58 have been killed, most recently an Algerian newspaper editor shot to death Saturday.

Witnesses said the blast dug a crater in the ground and destroyed Le Soir d'Algerie's offices. The explosion created panic in the densely populated neighborhood, which was celebrating the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Earlier Sunday, a car bomb planted in another bustling quarter of the capital, Bab el Oued, exploded and wounded 41 people.

The bomb went off in front of a heavily protected city office, and the building was seriously damaged. A hospital source said seven of the wounded were gravely injured and that the casualty toll could rise.

French television showed dozens of people peering at the mangled wreckage of a small car used to conceal the bomb in the Bab el Oued attack. A woman holding a baby on her hip picked her way through chunks of concrete.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for either attack, but suspicion fell on Islamic militants trying to topple the military-backed government and replace it with strict Islamic rule.

Independent Algerian newspapers reported Sunday that the Interior Ministry had ordered their editors on Saturday to submit any unofficial news report of violence to a censor.

"All information concerning terrorism and not issued by APS (Algeria Press Service), the official news agency, will be censured by the authorities," newspapers reported Sunday.

It was unclear whether the order would apply to foreign news agencies as well, and what the penalty for bypassing the censor would be. Up to now, the Algerian press has not faced such censorship.

Algerian journalists immediately decried the move, saying it was meant to distort the true magnitude of frequent clashes between Islamic militants and government security forces.

Violence in Bangladesh claims officer

CHITTAGONG, Bangladesh (AP) — Student demonstrations against upcoming elections grew more violent Sunday, escalating into gun battles and rioting that killed a police officer and injured 100 people, officials said.

Students exchanged gunfire with police in the southeastern port of Chittagong. Mohammad Basir, the third police officer killed in Bangladesh in a week, was trying to break up a protest by 500 students demanding the resignation of Prime Minister Khaleda Zia.

Basir suffered gunshot wounds during the gunfire and died in a hospital, colleagues said. Students smashed at least 50 vehicles and damaged several government offices in the city. Police arrested 500 people, mostly students.

Thirty students were injured when police beat them with clubs, officials said. Nationwide strikes and protests have disabled Bangladesh for two years.

The main opposition parties have threatened to thwart Thursday's voting if the prime minister does not step down and allow a neutral caretaker administration to supervise the next elections.

In Sirajganj, 65 miles northwest of Dhaka, rival groups hurled stones at each others, injuring at least 70 people. They attacked and damaged several shops and vehicles, officials said.

Mrs. Zia held campaign rallies Sunday, ignoring the general strike called by the opposition.

She accused the opposition parties of trying to block general elections at the prompting of "their mentors," an indirect reference to neighboring India, which denies involvement in Bangladesh's politics.

On Friday, a policeman died in Dhaka after he was hit by a crude bomb thrown by opposition activists. Another was killed Saturday, also in a bomb attack, during the prime minister's visit to Rajshahi, a northwestern city.

BOBBY BRITZKY / COLLEGIAN

Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds entertained a sold out audience at Amherst College Sunday night.

Matthews excels at Amherst

Tim Reynolds joins popular singer for acoustic concert

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

DAVE MATTHEWS & TIM REYNOLDS
LeFrak Gymnasium
Feb. 11

When Dave Matthews decided to team up with long time friend and musical partner, Tim Reynolds, for an all acoustical college tour, the idea in and of itself was brilliant.

Reynolds is a first rate guitarist with exceptional skills and the ability to create and imitate other instruments with ease and effort. Combined with Matthews careful crooning and lyrical abilities, the two were a stunning display of musical mastery.

However, the dynamic duo tried to create an intimate setting in a very un-intimate place, losing a lot of its audience in the process and handicapping what would have otherwise been an excellent show.

Illuminated by a single bedside lamp and soft colored gels, the two put on an outstanding set playing a lot of original material along with the more popular tracks from the Dave Matthews Band's latest album, Under The Table and Dreaming.

After thanking the unruly crowd for it's patience, Matthews introduced Reynolds as "a long time chum" he's known for "about 10 years." After dedicating the first song to his sister, the two began playing as if they were just jamming in their living room — a feeling interrupted only by the thunderous applause at the end of each song.

"Satellite" garnered the most appreciation by the crowd despite Matthews' shaky beginning. The chorus was a bit faster in tempo than the album version as his voice soared over the crowd's vocal accompaniment.

"Blue Water" tested Matthews ability to scale the higher notes and "Typical Situation" had everyone on their feet. This was followed by a solo from Reynolds that left no doubt in anyone's mind that he was a true virtuoso.

The sounds gleaned from the six strings of his guitar mimicking that of a steel guitar, a flute and yes, even a violin. His fingers flew and never faulted, making it look as effortless as breathing.

After his solo, Matthews dubbed Reynolds, "Superman" and said that the crowd's response "uplifted their spirits" — something he and Reynolds needed after a rather dry reception in Minnesota.

"What Would You Say," "Warehouse" and "Jimmy Thing" all off Under the Table were all great sounding. "Warehouse" began like a storm off shore building in size and sound before crashing into a tension breaking chorus which lightened up the mood and complimented the song perfectly.

Matthews and Reynolds bantered with the crowd, but fans in the back of the gym lost most of the quiet dialogue, hearing only mumbling. Even after the sound was turned up, it was hard to hear some of the lyrics and on-stage jokes. The evening would have been more appreciated at a smaller venue, however the staff did an admirable job of getting people settled and under control.

Matthews closed the show with the ever popular "Ants Marching" and finished up with another solo by Reynolds and one more song. The audience left knowing they had witnessed a stellar performance.

A look at cheap software to improve computers

Matthew Wurtzel

No one needs to spend big money on suites of utility applications when there are tons of inexpensive shareware and freeware packages available.

Everyone needs a zipping application to compress files.

Compressing files are important when you want to transfer files which will not fit on a floppy, or when you want to keep on-line transfer times down.

Quite possibly the best zipping package available is WinZip.

WinZip operates as a stand alone application in Windows, or as part of the File Manager or Explorer depending upon the version of Windows.

Both versions of WinZip for Windows 3.1 and Windows 95 operate exactly the same, except the version for Windows 95 allows for the long file names.

The only drawback to WinZip is that it's not very intuitive. The myriad options are liable to confuse an inexperienced user.

However, the basics are quite easy to learn. Unzipping files is simple, but zipping them is the hard part. B

Transferring files

Once you have an application to zip files, you might need one to transfer them across the Internet.

A freeware file transfer application which the Office of Information and Telecommunication at the University of Massachusetts usually supplies students when they obtain a World Wide Web account is WS FTP.

This application is feature rich, very intuitive and available for both versions of Windows.

Although Windows 95 comes with a file transfer application, it pales in comparison to other FTP applications.

The program window is split between the local system hard drive, and the Internet server.

Files can easily be transferred by highlighting it and simply pressing the arrow button in the direction of the transfer.

The application allows for the creation of new directories on the local drive, and renaming files on both the server and local drive. B+

Emulators

Another free application which the University gives students is EWAN, emulator without a name.

There are few emulators available, but EWAN is the best one.

Although EWAN was designed for Windows 3.1, version 1.052 operates flawlessly on Windows 95 — note the University may still be offering an older version.

Like most emulators EWAN is simple.

Windows 95 users may want to consider downloading a copy rather then using MS Telnet which comes with the operating system. A–

Most of these applications are free, or cost a small fee.

All the applications are available on the Internet at various Web sites and FTP sites.

All these applications are available at http://www.wlyn.com/stroud/cwsa.html where you can find out more information about these programs and others.

Director woos audiences with U.S. thriller

BROKEN ARROW
Directed by John Woo
with John Travolta & Christian Slater
Playing at Mt. Farms Four

With his latest film, Broken Arrow, John Woo will no longer just be called a great Hong Kong director, but a great Hollywood director as well.

John Travolta stars as Vic Deakins, an officer who has been in the military for 20 years. Driven by avarice and the power-hungry desire to play God, he plots to steal two of the government's nuclear bombs. On a practice stealth mission, Deakins sabotages his plane and crashes it in a Utah desert, making sure that he gets out safely with the stolen bombs — or what the military refers to as a "broken arrow."

His plans are waylaid when his co-pilot, Riley Hale (Christian Slater) also gets out safely, determined to thwart Deakins' plan. Slater then teams up with a Utah desert ranger (Samantha Mathis), and together they risk life and limb to recover the bombs.

For the majority of the movie, the two are shot at, smacked around and nearly blown up by Deakins and his team of ex-military terrorists, including his brawny righ- hand man, ex-L.A. Raider, Howie Long. The hazards they encounter include helicopter catastrophes, maimed bad guys and even a nuclear explosion.

COURTESY ZADE ROSENTHAL

John Travolta stars in Broken Arrow with Christian Slater.

Woo's second state-side venture is unrelenting with his use of non-stop action. His first Hollywood picture, Hard Target with Jean-Claude Van Damme, showcased many of the auteur's tricks, but wound up being just mediocre compared to his Cantonese action films.

The director is the father of modern action cinema. Hollywood notables like Robert Rodriguez and Quentin Tarantino owe much of their style to Woo and his ingenious craftsmanship. With films like The Killer, A Better Tomorrow II and Hard Boiled, Woo became a legend in Hong Kong but remains only a cult favorite in the States.

Some of Woo's success is due to his frequent use of actor Chow Yun-Fat. The problem with Broken Arrow is that Woo tries to conform Travolta into a Chow Yun-Fat-type of character, and he doesn't quite fit the mold.

Scripted by the same writer, Graham Yost, the comparisons of Broken Arrow to Speed are inevitable. Slater coins a decent action hero, with his acting talents surpassing that of Speed-demon Keanu Reeves. In her second role as Slater's love interest (her first in Pump Up the Volume), Mathis threatens to tread in the footsteps of the popular female victim, Sandra Bullock. Like Bullock, Mathis has that cute, not overly-attractive visage, and friendly persona that plays more realistic as the female lead character than past film divas.

The violence in Broken Arrow is eerily original. Death scenes involve all-new horrible methods. Woo stays true to his style — using slo-mo shots of Deakins smoking cigarettes, having Hale leaping horizontally while double- fisting firearms and keeping the body count high.

Though Broken Arrow is more about raw action than a compelling story, the film's energy and Woo's visuals are ample entertainment. Like all action films, w ithout a suspension of disbelief, the ride would be far too unbelievable. A–

Networks go overboard during Feb. sweeps week

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — We're about halfway through TV's February ratings "sweeps." Now what have we learned?

-That Tori Spelling is a terrible actress. (But we already knew that.)

-That Ted Danson looks pretty cool wearing a shoulder-length fall. (But we might have guessed that.)

-That Joan Collins maybe isn't such a great novelist. (But who really cares, besides Random House?)

And that's all just since Feb. 1. We've got another two weeks to go!

You know how the sweeps work. Three times a year, just when you think you'll never see a new installment of anything ever again, the networks pour on specials and "all-new" episodes beyond the capacity of any normal viewer's safe consumption.

Network lineups are ripped up like a Manhattan cross street, then studded specials are laid in like pipe. Big names crop up every rank-and-file sitcom. Strange-sounding programs with exclamation points proliferate, like "WOW! The Most Amazing Acts on Earth." Rockford and Cagney and Lacey return from the dead. Whatever the networks can think of that's promotable, they do. Then they promote it.

Wow!

Of course, there's a reason for this embarrassment of riches. It's to entertain you, the viewer.

No, dummy, it's not to entertain you. This exercise in humbuggery serves to hike the ratings during these periods of extra-obsessive audience measurement. Then, based on its artificially inflated viewer count, each network affiliate can demand extra-high prices for its commercial time in the months that follow.

So just consider this month as a Video Olympiad, with the networks scheduling steroids.

So what are some of the highlights thus far?

"Gulliver's Travels," of course. It was good and it got a big audience. It even made up for NBC's excessive hyping. Maybe. Maybe not.

Last week's "Law & Order" was also engrossing, especially the way the story jumped ...

... to "Homicide" two days later.

And "60 Minutes" was sssssmoking with its tales of nasty business in the tobacco industry.

However, the TV film "Co-Ed Call Girl" (a drama suggested by actual incidents) and starring Tori Spelling (who at times suggests an actual actress) wasn't exactly CBS's finest hour — especially since it lasted two.

And as for yet another sweeps offering, "The Greatest Shows You Never Saw," which the press release touted as "some of the best and funniest moments from television pilots that never made it to the air" — well, if you enjoy that kind of thing, I've got some unpublished fiction I wrote in high school you might like to borrow.

But besides the long-planned program "stunting" so typical to sweeps, the last couple of weeks brought some unscheduled surprises for the none-too-wary viewer.

Joan Collins, who once ruled the roost on "Dynasty," showed up last week on Court TV, of all places, testifying and sobbing. You'd cry too. Random House is suing her to recover a $1.3 million book advance.

O.J. Simpson did a guest turn on CNN's legal show, "Burden of Proof." His hour-long phone interview with the program's on-camera hosts, though unexpected and certainly unannounced, gave CNN a ratings spurt that lasted for hours.

And there's lots more to come.

For one thing, Elizabeth Taylor. In a masterful display of wall-to-wall cross-promotion, she will be making a clean sweep through all four of CBS's Monday sitcoms Feb. 26.

New England tuition higher than average

By Mindy Scalzetti
Collegian Correspondent

Rising tuition costs among New England colleges and universities is causing a major upset for many students whose financial aid cannot cover their tuition costs.

A recent poll from Mixed News for New England Higher Education says that tuitions in the area are on average $13,641, over $10,000 higher than the national average. According to the same poll, the fact that private academic institutions account for 48 percent of New England schools, public campus' are highly underfunded by the state. This lack of state funding or support creates these higher tuitions.

These increased costs are posing a problem for students whose financial aid is simply not enough to cover these costs. Deborah Gingras, a University of Massachusetts junior, is worried about not being able to return to school next fall. She lost a large federal scholarship and financial aid is not compensating the difference.

"They call a lot of things 'aid' but they don't really aid the students at all," she said.

Gingras attributes this to all the extra fees UMass requires, such as a mandatory meal plan for first and second year students.

"They manipulate your money out of you," Gingras said.

Conversely, Burt Batty, the director of financial aid for UMass said that approximately 13,000 students applied for financial aid for this current semester and 12,000 of these students received it, depending on financial status and need. The average amount awarded to both out-of-state and in- state applicants for this semester was $7,851.

Joyce Hatch, who works for the Administrative and Finance Department for the Vice Chancellor, said New England schools are a "salary intensive business" and "the cost of living in New England is one the highest in the country."

Gingras retaliates against both these claims by adding that "It's bad enough that UMass is the second most expensive state school in the country. Financial aid is not able to cover these students, thus they cannot pursue their education as they choose or repay the loans that is their only option left to take."

When questioned, Batty was unable to give an estimate as to how many students were forced to withdraw from the University last year because of financial aid reasons.

mers, he said.

Infrared spectroscopy is used to look at smaller scale interactions between polymer molecules created by Hsu.

The silk created in laboratories forms specifically at "interface" or when it is in contact with another substance such as air, Hsu said.

Hsu's research also focuses on the differences of silk formed at interface in comparison to silk in an aqueous solution within the spider. By using reflectent infrared spectroscopy, Hsu can probe the silk structure at interface to see if behavior is different between the silk formed at interface versus silk in it's aqueous solution.

A special technique using reflectent infrared spectroscopy was developed to see the behavior differences in silk formed at interface versus an aqueous solution of silk within the spider's gland by polymer physics student Sophie Riou. She designed and developed the LANGMUIR Trough to perform this specific technique. The apparatus tries to mimic the crystallization process of spider silk "in order to characterize how the crystals are formed and the kinetics or how fast they form," Hsu said.

Assistant Professor Sam Gido of the polymer science and engineering departments isolates the secreted silk from a gland within the spider and analyzes it by electron microscopy and electron refraction to better understand how the fluid becomes a strong fiber.

He also uses electron microscopy to study the organization of spider silk and the process the spider uses to make the fiber.

"We're trying to use what we learn about natural things like spider silk to make proteins with even better properties," Tirrell said.

"What I think will happen in the relatively short run is that we will learn to combine the material properties and biological functions of proteins to make new biomedical materials," Tirrell added. The new class of bioengineered materials include modified enzymes that researchers are synthesizing to form artificial blood vessels, and modified enzymes used as sensors in determining pesticide contamination.

the warring parties in the former Yugoslavia were seeking.

"If it were to be truly effective, it should have come two year earlier," said Ahmad.

Ahmad was critical of the fact that Westerns power watched genocide continue for three years, while at the same time maintaining a arms embargo on the Muslim backed Bosnian government.

The embargo, said Ahmad, which was supported by the West because they believed it would contain the war and prevent injury to UN Peacekeepers, put the Bosnian Muslims at a serious disadvantage.

Enter the Dayton Peace Accords — designed to bring peace to the region, the agreement, in reality, leaves the Bosnian Muslims in a precarious position, according to Ahmad.

The agreement "establishes a parity between the aggressor and the victor," said Ahmad, which he maintains never existed in the former Yugoslavia.

However, Ahmad said "it must be upheld. What little we have achieved must not be thrown away."

The danger of the agreement disintegrating are high, said Ahmad, in which case the only just solution would be to rearm the Bosnian Muslims.

"If I must choose between war and genocide — god dammit, I must choose war," Ahmad said.

The event was sponsored by the Five-College Program in Peace and World Security Studies (PAWSS).

New crew shell named

The women's crew named a new shell during halftime of UMass' men's basketball game against Temple Sunday. The new shell is 58 feet long, holds nine people and weighs less than 200 pounds. It was named in honor of the late Cecile Marcum, who passed away in 1994. Diana Marcum Skogsbergh, daughter of Bob and Cecile Marcum, and her daughters, Katie and Megan, dedicated the shell.

The shell was built in New Haven, CT by UMass alum Mike Vespoli. He has been building shells like this one for the U.S. men's and women's Olympic teams.

Tommy Morrison tests HIV positive

By Kelly Kurt
Associated Press

TULSA, Okla. — Tommy Morrison's up-and-down boxing career reached its low point Monday with the announcement that the powerful heavyweight had tested positive for the virus that causes AIDS.

Morrison's promoter, Tony Holden, confirmed that a test administered in Las Vegas last week came back HIV positive.

"He's taken it like a champ," Holden said. "He knows he's had a promiscuous lifestyle in the past. He's taking it better than his team (of handlers)."

Morrison, 27, did not attend the news conference. He remained in isolation at his home in the northeastern Oklahoma town of Jay, where he was providing blood samples to paramedics so further tests could be run.

He issued a statement asking people to pray for children affected by the disease because,

"I feel it would be selfish to ask you to say a prayer for me," Morrison says. "I understand that there are people concerned about me. I am fine."

Holden said results of the latest tests are expected within 48 hours. He said Morrison still held out hope that a retest would show the original test false, but that the fighter has already talked about getting involved in AIDS awareness activities.

"If it is true, I don't see us ever fighting again or ever wanting to," Holden said. "But right now we're not concerned about that."

Morrison had cited religious reasons when he initially refused to take a test for the virus in the days before his scheduled fight Saturday night against Arthur Weathers in Las Vegas.

He left a doctor's office but returned the next day to submit a blood sample. Holden said Monday he had told Morrison not to sign anything before contacting him or his attorney because of a new agreement with promoter Don King.

The Nevada Athletic Commission suspended him for medical reasons only hours before the fight.

Morrison's trainer, Tom Virgets, said he told the fighter the news of his suspension Saturday afternoon in the crowded casino at the MGM Grand hotel.

Morrison was to have received $50,000 to fight Weathers, the first step in a package of fights under promoter Don King that was to have led to a possible $4 million payday against Mike Tyson later this year.

Morrison is 45-3-1 in a seven-year career with 39 knockouts. His career has been marked by daunting setbacks, but he always seemed to work his way back.

derous rushin' Russian defenseman, nearly impossible to stop one-on-one. Only 19, his upscale is immeasurable. Playing in the company of Norm Maciver and Teppo Numminen, that's three blueliners with no fear of the offensive zone.

As for Selanne, a right wing, should he skate on a line with portsider Paul Kariya, that's much better than a poor man's version of Vancouver's Russian Rockets, Pavel Bure (buckled to the launching pad for months) and Alexander Mogilny. Can't you just see the Mighty Ducks' centers drooling at the chance to play with these guys?

That makes Kilger the X-factor. Not one to get much ice time, Kilger did alright (five goals, seven assists, 12 points, minus-two and 22 PIM in 45 games). The fourth overall choice in last year's draft, he gives the Jets two babyfaced power forwards (Shane Doan is the other) with noses for the net. They're not turning them upward yet, either, because neither commands the cash Selanne does, which Anaheim has.

It makes you wonder, though. It's indisputable that part of the reason Winnipeg will relocate to Phoenix next season is the current owners can't pay the bills. Phoenix's owners, which include Suns' General Manager Jerry Colangelo (I refuse to believe this guy knows anything about hockey), no doubt could support Selanne's salary, and in doing so they'd have retained a real drawing card in a town that isn't going to flock to Ashes games (that would be my choice for the new nickname) for the hell of it.

But if Tverdovsky and Kilger blossom, they along with Keith Tkachuk and Alexei Zhamnov could be the keys to perennial playoff runs in the desert.

• I should stop handicapping the Calder Trophy race so early in the year. Last season I threw Todd Marchant and Ian Laperriere in the hat. This year I called Marty Murray's name. He's been in the minors most of the season.

So I'm going to get it right this time. Actually, this will be my first try at an All-Rookie Team: LW—Jason Dawe, Buffalo (13-16-29), C—Yanic Perrault, Los Angeles (16-15-31), RW—Eric Daze, Chicago (25-13-38), LD—Marcus Ragnarsson, San Jose (8-21-29), RD—Deron Quint, Winnipeg (5-11-16), G—Corey Hirsch, Vancouver (9-7-5, 2.81 goals-against avg., .910 sv. percentage). Honorable Mentions: F—Daniel Alfredsson, Ottawa, D—Kyle Mclaren, Boston, Bryan McCabe, Islanders, G—Garth Snow, Philadelphia.

I'm sure I missed someone. Cheers to UMass goalie Dave Kilduff for singing Hirsch's virtues before he even got a chance.

If I had to pick one for the Calder, I think it would be Daze. Mario Lemieux is all the evidence anyone needs that Quebec turns out more than just goalies, and Daze, a big, checking winger, is exhibit B. He's one of the main reasons Chicago is a serious Stanley Cup contender.

• In sum, with the trade deadline just over a month away, two names top the list of those who could move: the Great One and Jeremy Roenick. Rumors surrounding Gretzky's address change have quelled since All-Star Weekend, probably because the Kings have demonstrated their commitment to winning by acquiring Kevin Stevens. If anyone could say what I just wrote without an outburst of laughter, they should consider acting school. Los Angeles isn't going anywhere, which means Gretzky is. I'd like to see him in Toronto (the fan in me breaking through), but if he goes to St. Louis, that's fine, because I'd love to see another Mike Keenan move push him towards the brink of total embarrassment. Of course, the owners under the Arch would be just as much to blame: after telling Keenan to cut payroll, now he's allowed to take on the biggest paycheck in the league?

• A goalie's name "you oughtta know": Alain Morrisette of the ECHL's Louisville Riverfrogs. If only they could play the UMass-Lowell Riverhawks.

• Gleams of hope in Beantown: It's often said that the Bruins organization is thin on prospects. At the top level, that's true. The only guys jumping from Providence are one game wonders like Davis Payne. But the top goaltender in the CCHA is Lake Superior State's John Grahame (2.07, .913), while Cameron Mann of the Ontario League's Peterborough Petes (what a name) ranks 10th in scoring (30-39-69). Both are Boston property, so keep an eye on them.

three spots, Kerrin McCarthy took first in the 100 yard backstroke with a time of 1:00.98, with Matacera and Kerrie Hodge in second and third.

"I think we gave a good effort, but it was a different kind of a meet for us, we different have the pressure," Newcomb said. We swam a lot of people in some different events, and it was good to get some people to swim different events and do some different things."

Seniors Griffith and Chapelle took first and third place respectively in the 100-yard breaststroke to put UMass out to a 73-20 lead after five events.

"Everyone swam smart races," Chapelle said. "I think it's a good sign for Atlantic 10s. I'm really excited."

Kussenko and Allery combined with a first and third place finish respectively also in the 200-yard butterfly. Baker also chipped in with her usual first place finish in the 50-yard freestyle with a time of 24.57. Toni Youngdahl grabbed second place right behind her.

"It was good. I think to have a little fun with it [this meet] before you go into a really intense meet," Baker said. "I think everyone is ready to go, pretty confident, and swim really fast [at the A-10's]."

Angelique Rodriguez dove off the boards to a first place victory in the one meter diving event, with Krystin Carpenter coming in third. In the three meter contest Carpenter was second best with Rodriguez in third.

Mullen cam in first with a time of 56.47 in the 100-yard freestyle with Youngdahl tenths behind her for second place. Kossenko pulled off her second victory on the afternoon in the 200-yard backstroke with Hodge in second.

Alexander and Jessica Farley rounded out the top finishers on the day with firsts in the 500-yard freestyle (5:19.27), and the 100-yard butterfly (1:02.85) respectively. Strothers was second in the 500, as was Hickey in the 100 with Chapelle in third.

Griffith and Jodi Walters took second and third respectively in the 200-yard breaststroke as did Schambach and Allery in the 200-yard individual medley. Fordham's Lehre took first in both events for the Rams. Graham was the only other first place finisher for Fordham on the day and that was in the three meter diving event.

The final race of the day was the 200-yard freestyle relay which may have been the most spirited of the day. In one lane it was the four seniors in Baker, Chapelle, Griffith and O'Connor challenging their own teammates to the race.

"Bob totally talked up the relay," Chapelle said. "The senior class challenges everyone on the team to a relay, so all week long we've been making sayings and chanting."

The seniors did come out on top to take the event against Fordham and their own teammates, however the other two groups for UMass were right behind them for second and third which summed up this meet nicely, and put an extra special touch on the excitement of senior day.

The Minutewomen ended their duel meet action this season with a record of 6-2, and will next head to the highly preached about Atlantic 10 Championships to conclude their season in Buffalo, N.Y. during February 22-24.

The Minutewomen will have a week and a half before A- 10s and in three words coach Newcomb attested to what his team needs to do right now to prepare for the meet.

"Rest, rest and rest," Newcomb said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — Budget your money wisely in order to accumulate savings. Catering to an unreasonable individual will only make the situation worse. Invite friends over for a casual supper.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — The emphasis now is on meeting your obligations. Avoid taking too much for granted or leaning too heavily on others. You need to take your time when working on financial figures or important details.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Allow extra time for a journey, especially if travelling by car. Traffic may be heavier than usual. Do not neglect your natural talents; branch out in a new direction.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Exercise restraint when dealing with career and financial matters. Get the most up- to-date information before making key decisions. A loved one's behavior may be confusing.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — You feel full of energy and ready to conquer the world. A newcomer finds your daring very appealing. Rely on an older person's expertise when the chips are down.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — People who work behind the scenes admire your style. A dormant romance could spring to life again. Protect your reputation by being discreet. Keep your personal and professional lives completely separate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Avoid making commitments you may not want to keep. Expand your intellectual horizons. A journey of the mind will lift your heart and spirits. Good timing is the key to professional and personal success.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — A busy day lies ahead. An upsurge of confidence is indicated. Be on the lookout for opportunities to advance your career. Gambling tips are unlikely to pay off. Save your money for a special treat.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — Someone who performs services for you may feel unappreciated. Be generous with your praise. Let harmony reign at home. Seek an expert's advice if concerned about a legal matter.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — Not a good day for taking chances. However, do seize a golden social opportunity. Wise choices are likely if you emphasize practical concerns. Be prepared to move on with the times.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — Avoid leaping back and forth from one project to another. Too much is at stake. Important details could get lost in the shuffle. Take a realistic approach to promises.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Discord is possible this morning. Use your talents as a mediator to restore peace. New friendships are indicated. Speak of your beliefs and hobbies. Your winning ways will not go unnoticed by an attractive newcomer.

Women's swim destroys Rams

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

Dominate (dŏm'…-n,t') v. nat–ed, -nat–ing, -nates. 1. To influence, control, or rule by superior power or Authority. v. dominated < The women's swimming and diving team dominated Fordham this past Saturday >.

The definition says it, and so does the score 211–87. The 211 points belonged to the Minutewomen as they took first place in all but three swimming and diving events on senior day, Saturday afternoon in Joseph R. Rodgers, Jr. Pool in Bowden.

Before a large charged up crowd that witnessed the last home meet of the season, the Minutewomen came off the blocks fast and jumped out to an early lead. UMass was only outscored in three events, and it seemed that from the start it was going to be a tough day for Fordham. The Rams felt the affects of only having one swimmer in a three on three race.

In six of 12 swimming events, and in both diving events, not including the relays, Fordham used less than the recommended three participants showing that its team lacked depth. In one event, Fordham used only one swimmer, guaranteeing UMass of at worst a second and third place finish.

"We're looking down the road right now, we're looking at the Atlantic 10s," said UMass coach Bob Newcomb. "They've [Fordham] been really good in years past, but right now they happen to be on the weaker side. They didn't have the numbers. Coming out of the Patriot league where they didn't have any scholarship money, and their program went down, simply because they didn't have the bodies."

This meet saw many different swimmers contribute for UMass. Of the 11 swimming and diving events that UMass won, not including the relays, a different swimmer took first place in each one of them except for Irina Kossenko who had two victories in the 200–yard backstroke and the 200 yard butterfly.

The meet alternated events for the men and women, with the Minutewomen getting things going with first and second place finishes in the 200–yard medley relay. Senior Jessica Griffith made up the time to edge out Fordham enabling her group of Shana Struthers, Kristin Chapelle and Amy Mullen to second place right behind teammates Meghan Matacera, Jodi Walters, Sarah Allery and Sarah Baker who took first.

Kristin Schambach won the 1000–yard freestyle event with a time of 10:52.51. Karen Sonnwald swam to the line first in the 200–yard freestyle with a time of 1:55.87, with her teammates Barbara Hickey and Julie Alexander right behind her with second and third respectively.

Men's swim stays perfect feel good entering A–10's

By Jay Warner
Collegian Staff

It was anything but a routine meet this past Saturday for the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team.

Not only was an undefeated season on the line, but it was also the final home meet for the graduating seniors.

In addition, it was the final preparation before next week's Atlantic 10 Championship, a tournament in which the Minutemen have to be considered favorites after completing their perfect season with a 175–124 win over the Fordham Rams.

"It was a good meet. The kids were swimming well and they are ready now for the A–10 championships. That's what this meet was, a final tuneup," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said.

Junior Chris Stanton and sophomore Matt Turner, both of whom will not be able to represent the Minutemen at the championships because of a lack of available spots, posted strong finishes while leading the way for UMass. Stanton took the win in the 100–yard freestyle and placed a close second in the 200–yard freestyle with times of 47.32 seconds and 1:44.06, respectively.

Turner showed his potential by placing second in the 100– yard backstroke with a time of 53.28 seconds, while also being a member of the winning 200–yard medley relay team.

"We had some nice swims by some of the kids who aren't going to the A–10 tournament who shaved for this meet. Stanton and Turner just did a tremendous job," Yarworth said. "It was nice to see them perform well. If Stanton decides he wants to be a good swimmer, he's going to be a very good swimmer in the next few years."

Sophomore Sean Anderson continued to dominate his competition and is quickly becoming a threat in every race he takes part in. Against Fordham, Anderson set a pool record in the 50–yard freestyle and took second in the 100– yard freestyle with times of 20.87 and 47.48. Anderson was also the anchor on both of the winning relay teams.

"He's in a different class as far as sprinters go in this league. I don't think anyone will touch him in the 50–yard free at the championships," Yarworth said. "Hopefully he's going to get himself down to an NCAA qualifying time. That's the goal."

Senior diver Justin Murphy, coming off a sub–par performance last weekend, finished off his final regular season meet in fine form winning the three–meter dive with a score of 250.35. Murphy redeemed himself with the victory after placing second in the one–meter dive earlier in the day.

"He's doing a little better," said Yarworth. "He's been a little inconsistent but I'm sure he'll be ready when the bell rings next week."

Also competing in their final regular season match were tri–captains Dave Laporte, Jeff Little, and Keith McLarty, as well as John Luviano, all of whom are seniors. McLarty was a second place finisher in the 200–yard backstroke with a time of 1:59.38 and placed third in the 1000–yard freestyle with a time of 10:20.24. Little placed third in both the 200– yard butterfly and the 500–yard freestyle with times of 1:59.55 and 4:59.74, respectively.

"They all bring different qualities to the team and you need those qualities," Yarworth said. "You need to have the heart and be able to keep up the intensity and they all do that in their own way."

With the win, the Minutemen finish the regular season at 8–0 and are confident about their chances at the A–10 Championship.

"We have a week and a half to sharpen up and go out there and see what we can do," Yarworth said.

Minutemen gym fall prey to Temple

By Jason Rubin
Collegian Staff

The No. 10 Massachusetts men's gymnastics team traveled to Philadelphia to compete in a tri–meet with Temple and Army this weekend.

Although the team turned in a solid performance, the Owls caught them in the last event, to win the meet by just 45 points.

Heading into the weekend, Massachusetts was coming off its best victory of the season. The team had been enjoying levels of consistency that it had not achieved in years. UMass had a gymnast in the top 15 of the nation in every event.

Although the meet resulted in a loss, the day had many positive outcomes. First of all, the team recorded its top tally of the season with an impressive score of 219.850. The Minutemen also took three individual, as well as two team events overall.

"I would like to think of the meet as a remember the Alamo' type thing," coach Roy Johnson said. "We have to remember it. It will make us practice a little harder, and concentrate a little more. It reminds us that we need to clean up some areas, so we are prepared to meet them on March 9," he added.

Just as there are some areas that need refining, there are many routines that the team seems to be hitting. Freshman Brad LeClair captured the top honors on the pommel horse with a score of 9.350, junior Chris Funk continued his domination on the rings with a 9.750 and junior Ruslan Shupak placed first on the vault with a 9.500.

Junior Gabe Columbus, who was ranked No. 15 in the nation in the all–around, was UMass' top overall performer. Gabe placed in the top five in three events.

I-CAC rookie of the week freshman Steve Pryor continued on his personal tear, with three solid performances. He continues to have a large impact on the team's success after transferring from Albany State.

There obviously is no consolation to finishing in second place. However, the margin of victory shows just how close it actually was. If one more gymnast had a slightly cleaner dismount, or a more technically sound routine, the final results would of been reversed.

The Temple loss ends the UMass winning streak at four, yet by no means is it a momentum breaker. This Friday the team travels to West Point, N.Y. to take on Army.

This meet offers the Minutemen a chance to regain their winning ways, against a school that they have some experience competing with.

UMass sends five to IC4As

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

Led by a record run by Tom Toye, five members of the UMass men's track meet qualified for the IC4As this passed weekend.

The freshman set the new all–time Minuteman mark with a time of 22.12 seconds in the 200–meter race at Saturday's St. Valentine's Day Invitational eclipsing the previous record (22.37) set by Kevin Walters at the New England Championship meet in 1992.

"Tom came as an outstanding short sprinter out of high school, and like I've said before, You know the kid's good, you just wonder how long it will take him to make the transition"," coach Ken O'Brien said. "He went down and ran against easily six or eight guys who are [legitimate NCAA performers] and he did a tremendous job."

Toye was one of five UMass athletes to check in with a top 10 finish. Senior captain Mark LeFebvre recorded a season–best throw (50–feet–11.5 inches) placing him fifth in the shot put behind four UConn athletes. In the process LeFebvre earned a spot in the IC4A meet and recorded the fourth–best indoor throw in school history.

Ron Tauro finished fourth in the hurdles (7.85 sec.), Bob Dalton came in 10th in the weight throw (47–feet–5 inches) and freshman Andre Roach placed ninth in the triple jump (43–feet–11.25 inches).

All told, five individuals and two relay teams logged scores that qualified them for the IC4A Championships. Along with Toye and LeFebvre, Matt Behl, Mike Maceiko and Ethan Nedeau will make the trip to Harvard on March 2–3 to compete in the IC4A competition.

Behl, a junior from Granville, qualified with a time of 14:40.68 in the 5000m while fellow junior Maceiko (Deer Park, NY) ran a 4:16.67 mile. Nedeau, a senior, placed 14th in the 5000m clocking a mark of 8:28.02.

Both relay teams scored season–best finishes in qualifying for IC4As. The combination of Toye, Chris Conner, Scott Price and Neil Concepcion ran the 4x400m relay in 3:21.19 while the distance medley relay was run in 10:14.86 by a revamped foursome of Mike Marchand, Dave Cahill, Mike Ferrari and Matt Ely.

"What [the juggling of the relay teams] allowed me to do was to put a little pressure on the [youngsters]," O'Brien said. "I thought they responded really well."

Fourteen of the 20 UMass athletes participating in the invitational were either freshmen or sophomores, including all eight relay runners.

"Overall, I was enthused with the results of the team and the individuals," O'Brien said.

Junior Walter Stock competed in the mile placing 31st and qualifying for the New England Championship meet with a time 4:19 flat. Stock's qualification for the New England Championship meet bumps the number of Minuteman entries to 18 while six individuals and two relay teams are set to go to the IC4A meet.

The Minutemen's tremendous showing at the St. Valentine's Day Invitational serves as a solid pre–cursor for the upcoming Atlantic–10 Championship in Rhode Island.

Just as encouraging as all the IC4A caliber performances by UMass athletes was Scott Price's solid time in the 200m, apparently culminating his comeback from an early season hamstring injury.

Also important to Massachusetts' championship hopes is the health of junior Paul Blodorn, the team leader in three events (800m, 1000m, mile) and a member of the 4x800m relay. Not competing at the Invitational, Blodorn got the week off and looks to be ready to go next weekend.

The Minutemen seem to be getting healthy and hitting stride at just the right time as they look to bring home the Atlantic 10 Championship on Feb. 17.

The Whale tops in NE; Selanne deal a draw; Bright Bruin prospects

If you're headed to The Mall tomorrow night, go ahead, wear your underwear on the outside, put the horse before the cart, just don't do anything ordinary, because the Whalers are looking down on the Bruins. The last time that could be said after the All–Star break (I have been unable to find the exact date), you probably hadn't even heard of high school yet.

Kottler on the NHL

But now that you're all grown up, it will be easier to accept this most unlikely of scenarios. Unless, of course, you like the Bruins. Can't really help you there. I think one reason why the postal rate keeps increasing is the Bruins are cashing in on bulk rates to mail in their effort each night.

Those armchair demographers should enjoy themselves at this game. For years, when the Bruins play in Hartford, the games have been little more than a chance for Boston fans to pay Mall prices to see their team, which commits grand larceny each time it "plays" in its assembly line, antiseptic, 508–area code–balcony building.

The Civic Center holds plenty of folks, and the ratio of Bruin to Whaler fans usually surpasses two to one. If that continues Wednesday, it will be the first nail in the coffin of the Whalers' life in Insurance Land. They are 12–4–1 in 1996, their franchise player, Brendan Shanahan, scored 20 goals in a recent 20–game stretch, and their floundering power play has been brought to life by Vancouver castaway Jeff Brown.

Upon Sean Burke's return to health, all this spells playoffs. If the Bruins, which play on the road six more times after Wednesday's game, don't return from the trip 4– 3 or better, that spells L–O–T–T–E–R–Y pick...for the Oilers, who own Boston's first pick, via the Bill Ranford deal.

• We don't just talk about trades in this space, we like to classify them. Let's file this one under "trades that may well turn out dead even": Teemu Selanne from Winnipeg to Anaheim for Oleg Tverdovsky and Chad Kilger. What, you say? Selanne is the only player in the deal you ever heard of? Tverdovsky is a won-

UMass astronomy dept. building new telescope

By Anastasia Kudrez
Collegian Staff

By the year 2000, astronomers hope to have a "window on the early universe," using a new telescope the size of the Lederle Graduate Tower.

The University of Massachusetts astronomy department and the Instituto Nacional de Astrofisica, Optica y Electronica (INAOE) of Mexico are building the largest millimeter telescope in the world.

The $49 million telescope is expected to lead to breakthrough discoveries about the origins of the galaxy. The project also symbolizes a growing partnership between the U.S. and Mexican scientific communities.

Professor Stephen Strom, chairman of the Five College Astronomy Board and director of the project, explained the advantages of the Large Millimeter Telescope (LMT).

"We will be able to see a very different part of the universe, the cold universe," he said. "The ability to see cold gases will allow us to observe how galaxies form and understand how existing galaxies came about."

The LMT will be able to detect astronomical objects in the one to four millimeter band. Project scientist professor Andrew Harris explained this concept.

"Dust and molecules, which make up the one to four millimeter wavelength, are like radio stations, transmitting at certain wavelengths," he said.

The LMT is designed to receive millimeter wavelength radiation, and its massive dish can gather a huge amount of data. Harris compared the LMT to a bowl collecting rain.

"The bigger the bowl, the more rain you catch. The bigger the dish, the more photons you catch," he said.

Allen Langord, the program manager, is responsible for the logistics of building the LMT. He described the project as "an incredibly complex and technically challenging effort."

The LMT will be made of many materials, including steel, aluminum, and space–age carbon–reinforced plastic. The surface of the dish will have 126 computer–controlled panels. This active computer–controlled or "intelligent" surface will keep the LMT focused.

Both Strom and Langord expressed strong commitment to the cross–cultural nature of the project.

"With its binational character, it will be a way to attract students. Outreach programs to inform Hispanic students about the LMT project will provide role models in astronomy, and attract students to UMass," Strom said.

In Mexico, there is a parallel scientific and administrative staff working on the LMT. The challenges of cooperating on the project are part of the LMT Vision, which promotes "a U.S.–Mexican cooperation to develop major scientific facilities, human resources, new technologies, and the new management structures required for successful international ventures."

The LMT research offices at UMass reflects this binational partnership.

Yolanda Gonzalez, the LMT executive assistant, arrived from INAOE six months ago. She described herself as "everyone's assistant," and is responsible for everything from creating conference itineraries to working directly with U.S. and Mexican government officials.

Luis Medina came to UMass to direct the planning activities and implement a total quality management program. Medina is responsible for insuring each aspect of the project maintains the highest standards. He described the project as "more of a business" from his standpoint. However, he said the LMT "business" is extraordinarily complex, because it involves two countries, as well as industry and academia.

"I need to sort interests and consolidate differences into specific tasks and task purposes," he said.

Arturo Osorio is solely responsible for the finance and purchasing of the project. From his UMass office, he organizes the accounts and coordinates both the U.S. and Mexican budgets. Despite the complexities of managing a binational $49 million budget, Osorio remains upbeat.

"It's a lot of work," he said, grinning.

The LMT project officially began in late 1994. By the end of 1996, contractors will be selected to build the LMT. By June, 2000, the LMT should be installed and tested for its "first light."

When asked what the LMT will focus on for its first probe into the universe, Strom laughed and said, "Probably something really bright, like a planet."

Editor's note: This is the first in a three part series.

Steve Cohen, a senior accounting major, tries on the Amaze–A–Vaze, which has become a hit all over Europe.

Information about LMT

• The LMT reflector disk has a 50 meter diameter, roughly the size of Lederle Grad Tower.

• The LMT is not the largest radio telescope in the world, but it will be the largest millimeter wavelength radio telescope.

• The LMT's $49 million price tag is being split by the U.S. and Mexico. UMass is contributing $2.5 million.

• The surface of the dish will be made of 126 computer–controlled panels, each five meters wide.

• The dish will be enclosed in a radome, similar to the sphere at Disney's Epcot Center.

• The telescope is scheduled to be installed and tested by June 2000.

Hats off to UM graduate Dwyer

It's shaped like a vase. It's made of paper. It's squeezable, stretchable, and reversible. And according to the inventor of the Amaze–A–Vaze, hundreds of thousands of Europeans wear it on their heads.

The unexpected success of the paper hat took inventor Kevin Dwyer, a University of Massachusetts alum, by surprise.

"A company from Holland ordered 50,000 of them. Now the country is covered with posters of people wearing the hat," he said.

Dwyer, who owns and operates the company Hats Incredible, Inc., has already sold over 10,000 hats to companies in Europe and America. Several editions of European fashion magazines featured the hat as a trendy accessory item. A 1993 Spanish edition of Elle showed how ribbons and flowers can accent the hat. A 1994 edition of Vogue España illustrated possible shapes for the hat.

Now Dwyer hopes to extend his European success to American markets.

"I envision selling the hat in Florida as beach wear, and to college students as a novelty item," he said.

According to Dwyer, hat colors define different markets. Beach hats would be painted with fluorescent colors, conservatively painted hats would appeal to an older crowd, and college students could wear their school colors.

Dwyer, who attended the University of Massachusetts from 1970 to 1973, is attempting to introduce his hat to his Alma Mater. He sent samples of the hat to the Mullins Center marketing department in hopes of distributing them at events.

"If students wear them at a basketball game, it would give great exposure to the hat," he said.

Mark Wilson, director of the Mullins Center marketing department, commented, "It sure is unique. I could see how they'd sell."

Amaze–A–Vaze may have enthralled the European fashion world, but it has yet to be seen if its appeal will extend to college students.

May Chan, a sophomore apparel marketing major, admired Dwyer's concept. Although she didn't foresee its popularity on campus paralleling Europe, she thought some students would buy it.

"It's funky. People who want to look different would probably wear this," she said.

Chan also noticed the versatility of the hat, saying it would be an interesting vase or desk decoration. She said she would pay up to $30 for it.

Chan's price estimate was on target. According to USA Today, the hat sold for $28 at Fellissimo, New York and Barneys in 1995. According to Dwyer, the hat sells for $75 in Singapore.

The hat is now sold at Faces in Northampton for $6.50. Each hat costs about $1.50 to produce and package, Dwyer said.

The hat's history dates to 1978. While working in a Los Angeles spa, Dwyer saw a vase made of paper, and decided to find a creative use for it. By sanding the edges and painting it, he made a hat that could stretch to any size head.

In 1981, he found a suitable paper company, the Illinois–based Hexacomb company. He was making the hats with college students in Rhode Island when a Belgian businessman, Bart DeLeeuw discovered it. In April 1995, DeLeeuw placed an order for 50,000 hats, and has since placed other bulk orders.

Two months ago, Dwyer bought the honeycomb paper–making equipment from Hexacomb with business partner Bill Young. The 50–foot by 24–foot machine cost $39,000, and should soon be in operation.

"Last night I got an order for 100,000 hats for a Turkish company. It's going to be a big year," he said.

Guard against STDs, warns health group

By Melanie B. Arruda
Collegian Staff

Couples are reminded to love responsibly this Valentine's Day by the sponsor of National Condom Day, the American Social Health Association (ASHA).

"It is crucial that sex partners talk openly about the sensitive subject of sexual health and use condoms to protect one another from sexually transmitted diseases (STDs)," said ASHA President Peggy Clarke.

Protecting yourself doesn't mean giving up sexual pleasure, Coates said. It just means finding ways to have sex more safely, she added.

Whenever individuals have sex, they need to protect themselves from STDs, according to the ASHA. The choice of birth control is an important factor in protecting your sexual health. Some types of birth control help protect you while others expose you to the risk of getting an STD.

An estimated 55 million Americans, one in four adults, have STDs. There are 12 million new infections each year. Two–thirds of new infections occur in people under 25 and one–fourth occur in teenagers.

Condoms offer the best form of protection for sex that involves penetration either into the vagina, mouth or anus. When used correctly, condoms protect both partners by preventing contact with bodily fluids such as semen and vaginal fluids, said public relations staff member Elinor Coates. They also prevent the spread of infections, STDs, and pregnancy.

Several types of condoms are on the market. The male latex condom is the most effective at preventing pregnancy and STDs at a relatively inexpensive price.

The female condom is effective at preventing pregnancy and STDs. The condom can be inserted into the vagina up to two hours before sex.

The male plastic condom is still under study for pregnancy and STD prevention. It does not cause latex allergies and may feel "warmer" than the latex condom, according to the ASHA.

Coates strongly advised against the use of natural membrane ("animal skin") condoms for protection against STDs and pregnancy since skin is porous and allows sperm to permeate through the condom.

The most important factor in using a condom depends on its correct use from start to finish

Gramm drops out of race after losses in Iowa, La.

By John King
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — Battered by back–to–back defeats in Iowa and Louisiana, Texas Sen. Phil Gramm called top supporters around the country yesterday night and told them he would quit the Republican presidential race, GOP sources said.

Gramm planned an afternoon announcement today in Washington. Gramm's departure would leave an eight–man GOP field, with one week to go before the New Hampshire primary. It also would remove from the race a dogged conservative campaigner who early on was viewed by Sen. Bob Dole's campaign as the biggest threat to Dole's status as the GOP front–runner.

Gramm entered the race with great aplomb, boasting to a fund–raiser the night before his campaign announcement that he "had the best friend in politics — ready money." Hoping to capture the spirit of the 1994 GOP congressional sweep, Gramm labeled Dole a compromiser, heralded his role in helping Ronald Reagan get his tax–cutting 1981 budget through Congress and frequently declared to audiences, "I was conservative before conservative was cool."

Gramm went on to raise more than $20 million, but spent heavily in 1995 and his campaign never realized its promise. He was facing dim prospects in New Hampshire and beyond after being stunned by Pat Buchanan in Louisiana last week and then placing a distant fifth Monday in Iowa's caucuses. In both states, Buchanan won Christian conservative support that Gramm had been counting on to come his way.

But Gramm abruptly canceled afternoon campaign events and flew back to Washington to meet with friends and advisers and assess his prospects. By early evening, he was calling top supporters around the country and informing them of his plans to quit, according to three GOP sources who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity. Several top Gramm aides also were informing friends and associates, the sources said.

"When you run fifth in Iowa, an important state, you would have to be brain dead not to take a look at where you are and what you're doing," Gramm told reporters before leaving New Hampshire. "One of the things that we're going to try to do this afternoon and tonight is to take a look at where we are."

The sources said Gramm looked at three options: quit, retreat from New Hampshire to concentrate on a few Southern states, or retreat and make one last–ditch effort in South Carolina, which holds the first Southern primary on March 2.

He went through the finances and the organization and just decided it wasn't there," said one of the sources.

Speaking to reporters earlier in the day, Dole was sympathetic toward the plight of his rival, having struggled in two previous White House runs himself. "I went through that before and, you know, Phil is a very able person," Dole said. "He will make the right judgment, whatever he thinks he should do."

Gramm, 52, would be the third candidate to quit the race; California Gov. Pete Wilson had a short–lived campaign, and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter quit late last year after his effort to rally party moderates who support abortion rights failed to generate much financial or organizational support. Wilson and Specter now support Dole.

Gramm, who also faces re–election to his Texas Senate seat this year, had no immediate plans to endorse a presidential candidate, two of the sources said. He departure, though, is likely to bring Dole some additional support from GOP Senate colleagues who were backing Gramm.

Gramm's Senate supporters include Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, Paul Coverdell of Georgia and Bob Smith of New Hampshire. Texas Gov. George W. Bush and Arizona Gov. Fife Symington also had endorsed Gramm, and he had significant support among House Republicans.

Gramm was running in single digits in New Hampshire polls. Republicans here said the short–term beneficiary of a Gramm departure could be Buchanan, ironically, because much of Gramm's support here is among gun enthusiasts also targeted by Buchanan. Down the road, Gramm's decision could have ripples on the GOP contest if the nomination is still up for grabs when the campaign reaches the South. He had a respectable organization in South Carolina, deep support in Georgia, and was favored at home in delegate–rich Texas, which would become a major Super Tuesday prize now if the GOP race is contested into mid–March.

Several of Gramm's top supporters had urged him to quit the campaign and concentrate on his Texas Senate race. But a few advisers wanted him to hold on through the Feb. 20 leadoff New Hampshire primary in case Dole faltered.

At one point last week, Gramm said he would end his campaign if he did not finish in the top three in Iowa, but he then backed away from the statement. But Gramm resumed deliberations on his future as the disappointing Iowa results came in.

McCain, his national campaign chairman and close personal friend, told Gramm to stop dissecting what had gone wrong and try to honestly assess his chances for a comeback in the next two weeks, according to campaign sources.

Smith, Gramm's top backer here, told Gramm chances for a quick rebound in New Hampshire were bleak, according to the sources.

every time you have vaginal, anal or oral sex, Coates said. Your lifestyle, preferences, age and relationships are all factors.

A drawback of condoms includes its inability to protect the user from every STD. For example, if a sexually active person has a herpes sore not covered by a condom, the sore may touch your skin and spread the infection to your partner.

Lab studies show spermicides, such as creams, foams, suppositories, jellies or film, kill many of the germs that cause STDs. Yet they offer less protection than condoms, Coates said, since it does not protect the skin around the vaginal opening.

A diaphragm, sponge and cervical cap can be used by women to hold spermicide up to the cervix (entrance to the uterus). Spermicide used with these methods can protect the cervix from STDs. For optimum protection, these methods should be used with condoms for back–up protection.

Birth control pills, Norplant implants and Depo–Provera injections offer no protection against STDs. All of these use man–made hormones to prevent against pregnancy. Condoms should be used with these methods of birth control in order to offer protection against STDs, Coates said.

The IUD also offers no protection against STDs. The IUD is a small device placed inside the uterus to prevent pregnancy. According to ASHA brochure information, the use of an IUD may increase the chance a woman will develop Pelvic Inflammatory Disease, especially within a few weeks of having an IUD put in by her doctor.

At least 20 percent of adult Americans have a viral STD that has no cure. These lifelong STDs include genital herpes, human papilloma virus (HPV), hepatitis B, and the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) that causes AIDS.

Bacterial STDs include chlamydia, gonorrhea and syphilis, that can usually be cured with antibiotics. Chlamydia and gonorrhea continue to spread at alarming rates since they often have no symptoms and many cases go undetected and untreated.

The most important thing is that the individual knows how to use the method they have chosen and are committed to using it correctly every time, Coates said.

"Many couples find that sex is more enjoyable if they don't have to worry about getting an STD," Clarke said. "Open communication about sexual health can lead to greater intimacy," she added.

Feb. 8

Du–Ryung Shinn, 26, of 1039 North Pleasant St., Amherst, was arrested for a third offense of operating a motor vehicle on a suspended license.

Feb. 10

Kevin W. Downer, 18, of 24 Colson St., Billerica, was arrested for operating under the influence of alcohol, and charged with a defective tail light violation.

Disturbance

Feb. 10

Police spoke to parties involved in a fight in the vicinity of Moore Residence Hall.

Feb. 11

An unwanted individual was reported to be in a Kennedy Residence Hall.

Animal complaint

Feb. 8

Police responded to a report of frozen ducks at the campus pond; they were okay.

Liquor law violations

Feb. 8

Matthew J. Dwyer, 18, of 12 Wilson St., Bedford was arrested for underage possession of alcohol, a false ID card, procuring alcohol for minors and receiving stolen property under $250.

John Yang, 18, of 4 Washington St., Bedford, was arrested for underage possession of alcohol.

Scott D. Hartwell, 19, of 35 Elmbrook Rd., Bedford, was arrested for underage possession of alcohol.

Michael P. Donaldson, 18, of 305 Concord Rd., Bedford, was arrested for underage possession of alcohol.

Latceny

Feb. 8

An individual reported a vase with flowers stolen from McNamara Residence Hall.

Feb. 10

Police recovered property on Orchard Hill Drive that was stolen from a vehicle.

Medical emergency

Feb. 9

A Brown Residence Hall individual reported being assaulted off campus. It was referred to Amherst Police.

An individual in Mary Lyon Residence Hall, with abdominal pain, was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Assault & battery

Feb. 9

There was a report that a PVTA bus driver was assaulted on Presidents Drive. The incident is currently under investigation.

Feb. 10

A domestic assault in Kennedy Residence Hall resulted in a restraining order being issued. Jefferey D. Desmarais, 19, of 49 Ames Ave., Chicopee, was arrested and charged with assault and battery, for trespassing and for carrying a dangerous weapon — metallic knuckles.

Police are investigating an indecent assault which occurred in a Central Residential Area residence hall.

Vandalism

Feb. 9

Damage was done to five vehicles in Parking Lot 11.

Burglary

Feb. 9

Four individuals entered a John Q. Adams Residence Hall room and caused a disturbance. It is currently under investigation.

Feb. 10

A John Q. Adams Residence Hall room was broken into and trashed.

Feb. 11

An individual reported money stolen from her John Q. Adams Residence Hall room.

Accident

Feb. 9

A vehicle rolled out of a parking space in lot 11 and struck another vehicle.

Minor damage caused by a vehicle backing out of a Southwest Circle space.

Feb. 11

A vehicle hit a Mullins Center overhead door.

Assist other PDs

Feb. 10

Police assisted with the notification of an individual that a family member had been involved in an accident in Belchertown.

Health / safety hazard

Feb. 10

Environment, Health and Safety was notified about a refrigerator left outside Greenough Residence Hall.

Feb. 11

Environment, Health and Safety was notified of a computer sparking and smoking in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library.

Intoxicated person

Feb. 11

An intoxicated person found on Massachusetts Avenue was "turned over to a responsible party."

Suspicious person / activity

Feb. 11

Steven T. Falconer, 20, of 5 James St., Norton, was arrested for altering a license.

Why do you either love or hate Valentine's Day?

CompuServe reinstates sex-related newsgroups

By Paul Souhrada
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Reversing course, CompuServe is allowing its subscribers to reach all but five of some 200 sex-oriented portions of the Internet it had declared off-limits under pressure from German prosecutors.

But the online service has also given parents the ability to block offensive material for free, adopting a practice already used by America Online and Prodigy.

"The idea is to put control in the hands of the user. We think that's something the industry can get behind," CompuServe spokesman Jeff Shafer said yesterday in announcing that it is restoring access to most sex-oriented "newsgroups."

The five newsgroups that are still beyond the reach of CompuServe's 4.3 million subscribers contain child pornography, Shafer said. The more than 200 reinstated newsgroups include topics such as bestiality and fetishes.

The Internet allows people around the world to post and exchange text and pictures on thousands of electronic discussion forums called newsgroups. These can often be reached via a local phone call to an online service.

Free speech advocates welcomed CompuServe's reversal.

"CompuServe made a big mistake when it caved in to the government censors in Germany," said Marc Rotenberg, director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington.

CompuServe blocked its subscribers from reaching sex-oriented newsgroups in December after state prosecutors in Bavaria warned that it was investigating Internet distributors of sexually explicit material.

CompuServe, a Columbus-based unit of H&R Block Inc., said it did not have the technology to block access to only its 220,000 German users, so it barred all its subscribers.

Gerhard Zierl, spokesman for the Bavarian Justice Ministry in Munich, said the investigation is still open.

"It certainly will be CompuServe's responsibility if these newsgroups with content that is illegal under German law are made available again," he said. "What the prosecutors will do then, I can't say."

The controversy demonstrated the potential difficulties of doing business in cyberspace, a borderless technology in a world of borders.

"Companies that want to do business internationally are at a loss to deal with the political and cultural differences," said Gary Arlen, president of Arlen Communications, a Bethesda, Md.-based research company that specializes in interactive services. "I am struck these days at how rapidly these companies have to confront these new rules and restrictions in cyberspace."

ELECTION '96

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

What should the government's top priority be in 1996?

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Bill Clinton

"The government's top priority in 1996 must be implementing sound economic policies, moving to balance the budget, fighting crime and violence, protecting quality education and health care for the elderly, and a safe and clean environment."

Bob Dole

"I will put the federal budget on a seven-year balance budget plan; provide meaningful tax relief for working Americans, and reform our failed welfare system."

Lamar Alexander

After putting the federal government on the path to a balanced budget, the top priority of the federal government should still be to create an environment where millions of new jobs can be created through lower taxes, fewer regulations, more trade, and more incentives to invest and start new enterprises."

Richard Lugar

"Beyond ensuring the security of the United States, our top priority must be to bring the U.S. economy out of its current period of stagnant wages and low growth and to achieve long-term improvement in productivity, wages and economic expansion."

Pat Buchanan

"Downsizing the federal government while slashing the tax burden on American families."

A singular sensation

Marni Helfner

In case you didn't know it, today is Valentine's Day, and a painful reminder to those single folk out there that they have no one special in their lives.

This year is especially painful because most of my friends have graduated or are planning on graduating and are beginning the rest of their lives. One of my friends, Chrissy has a year old baby. Jen, another one of my friends, just got engaged and my friend Amy is getting married in August.

All of a sudden, I am caught up in an adult world, where I am expected to buy presents and attend showers, find myself a date and sit through two-hour ceremonies, wear ugly bridesmaid dresses and attempt to smile at the best man.

I have no desire to partake in any of these masochistic rituals for several reasons. First I look ridiculous in bridesmaid dresses — they never fit right, and I always look like a reject from Gone With The Wind.

Second, the pressure to find my perfect mate, get married and have babies, is increased exponentially. Of course, people don't believe me when I tell them I want to wait several more years, especially my family. The day after I graduated from high school, my parents held a graduation party for me. Dozens upon dozens of relatives came and spent all afternoon fending off small, wrinkled aunts and third cousins, who repeatedly asked, "So, now that you're done with high school, when are you going to find a nice boy and get married?" or "Always a bridesmaid, never a bride." My stomach turned somersaults at every utterance.

The pressure is on. To meet someone, get married and start squeezing out kids. It's everywhere, from the magazines I read to the comparison between me and my brother. He's 19 and he's engaged. I'm too old, and not engaged. My dad keeps asking me when he's going to get some grandkids, and I keep telling him that he'll get grandkids when I'm damn ready.

Third, this means that I have to grow up. I have to stop blowing off work and start thinking about a mortgage payment. I have to stop casually dating and start looking for the perfect mate. I have to trade in my '68 Mustang for a more reliable car. I have to stop paying one credit card with another. I have to stop partying 'til five in the morning and get up every morning. I have to learn to believe that I really have stopped growing.

I am leaving behind the last vestiges of my childhood, as I give up fluff and start to eat horse feed. Oh, I meant "Cracklin' Oat Bran." My attempts at denying this growing up include refusing to be in my friend Jen's bridal party. That was until she called me up in tears and said if I didn't do it, she was going to never speak to me again. I figured wearing a dumb yellow satin dress for an afternoon was worth it if it meant keeping our friendship alive.

I'm sure I would love the opportunity to plan and be in a wedding, but I'm just not really sure I want the hassles of finding the money, getting the perfect dress, picking out the invitations, choosing a guest list, ordering flowers and food and oh yes, meeting the right person.

Of course, I'm bitter to some extent, and perhaps even a bit jealous, but you couldn't wish a wedding on me right then. I'm content with the party life I have now, and am not ready to settle down for the rest of my life. I am too afraid that the wildness in my life will die away and I will compromise who I am in order to find happiness. But I'm sure, if I found the right person I would walk down the aisle in a minute.

Happy Valentine's Day, and remember this: until that day arrives, that old saying may still be true, "Always a bridesmaid, never a bride," but I'll still be following Mae West's advice, "Good girls go to heaven, but bad girls go everywhere."

The notebook of love

Amy Paradysz

I all started with a notebook.

People always ask me, "Why are you getting married?" To me, the answer seems pretty obvious. Because I happen to love someone who loves me and we want to spend our lives together. So I was confused with this question until I realized that the average college student just cannot imagine how this came to be.

As I said, it started with a notebook. And with a bar chat, I suppose, if you want to start before I came into the picture.

An Arabic linguist from West Springfield was at a bar near the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, Calif. His friend, a former college student gave him some advice on how to meet chicks once he arrived at the University of Massachusetts. "Take one of those dykes studies classes. They're good places to meet chicks."

Before long, a guy in a suit was sitting in my History of Women in the Modern Middle East class — which, by the way is a history class. And obviously, I sat next to him, since he was the only male in the room. That was it for that day, no love at first sight. Maybe it was that day that I asked, "You have some cool internship or something?" pointing at his suit. I don't remember.

Several weeks and chit-chats later, he asked me if I wanted to hang-out with some of his friends that night. I declined, explaining that I had plans to write to a computer penpal at 10 p.m.

Then my journalism professor asked our class to cover a speech that had something to do with the Middle East. I arrived early and sat on a couch down the hall from the lecture. Next to Kevin.

I don't remember what we talked about that day. It certainly wasn't that conversation that clinched it. As I said before, it was the notebook I let him borrow so he could take notes. He helped me whenever he saw my forehead scrunch up in frustration every time the speaker used an Arabic word.

Halfway through the lecture I realized that I had 45 min. to write an article on the speeches. I grabbed my stuff and left, without my notebook which contained at least one miscellaneous paper I needed for each class.

For a week, until our next history class, I wondered who this Kevin was. It still wasn't love. I just wanted that darn notebook, but somewhere along the way it did become more.

We traded names and phone numbers (Kevin what? I asked when I heard that formerly incongruous group of letters pronounced). But instead of using that information to rectify the notebook situation, we used it to call each other every day until we didn't even mention the notebook anymore. We argued about the army, God and whether or not the DC food was any good (maybe it was after some time in the army). Finally, the inevitable came. It was time to pick up my notebook and end it.

"I stood half-in and half-out of his room for almost two hours, wearing my winter coat almost the whole time, until I came in for a cup of tea. I don't remember if we drank tea, although I suppose we did."

But when I arrived at the front door of his building, Kevin was empty-handed. Despite what I usually say about him making the go upstairs to get my notebook, I was relieved. I stood half-in and half-out of his room for almost two hours, wearing my winter coat almost the whole time, until I came in for a cup of tea. I don't remember if we drank tea, although I suppose we did.

A few days later I woke up barely able to move due to a high school back injury. My roommate brushed my hair for me and scrounged up a pain pill, while I tried not to whine. By that evening, I was ready to scream with boredom. I called Kevin.

"Hey, you want to go to the movies?" I asked.

We had 15 min. to get to the movie (Interview With a Vampire). I couldn't move, but had to drive because Kevin didn't have a car. Oh, and I forgot to mention that when I was trying to get dressed without moving my upper body, I sat on my glasses. Thankfully, after my roommate helped me put on my coat, she taped in the lens.

The only seats left were in the front row (which was good because the lens wouldn't fall out if I was looking up). We had to organize our coats behind my back and neck so I could sit straight as a board while looking up.

This may be an incredibly sappy thing to say, but it was good just to be able to glance at Kevin in the corner of my eye. A couple times, he was looking at me too.

During a scary part, he took my hand. I looked down and my lens fell out.

Love is strange.

The future of my discontent

Wendy Darling

I think I've discovered my personal hell. It's a familiar place, one many have come to know and love, easily accessible to anyone with a television. It's name? The U.S.S. Enterprise, as it appears in Star Trek: The Next Generation.

The realization that this ship is fated to be my eternal suffering took many years to develop, years during which I expended literally thousands of hours partaking in the adventures of Jean Luc Picard and his crew. I delighted in the antics of the famously flamboyant Q, marvelled at the unending talents of Data and sighed at the noble sensibility of the ship's captain.

I was in awe of the holodecks, in love with the notion of interactive computers and dazzled by the crew's seemingly unlimited access to music, historical records and leisure time.

The ship (and the show) became a kind of paradise in my mind, something with the ability to provide me with absolute contentment and peace, at least for the duration of the hour it aired. Little did I expect it when about four months ago, the spell was broken by a two minute conversation with my roommate.

I told her about my affection for the show and the way I used to watch it every night at home with my parents. She was disgusted with the show and, I think at least partially, with me.

"I can't stand it," she said. "To me, that show, that life represents everything I hate about this stupid society today."

I asked her what she meant.

"I mean, it's so messed up. Everything is so sterile! It's all technology, computers, simulations. It's like the people are all dead, just like they are here now, or are becoming. All my fears are coming true!"

I did not attempt to make a reply. But I thought about it. And then I knew it was true: the Enterprise is my personal hell.

Think about it, all you ST:NG lovers, you people who read those Star Trek technical manuals like they're the Bible, all those who have mastered the game of three-dimensional chess.

On Earth in the here and now, people wear all sorts of clothes. On the Enterprise, half the people wear uniforms, tight, unflattering, itchy-looking uniforms. Standard colors are red, turquoise and a sort of dirty marigold. The zippers are in the back somewhere. Very nice.

But suppose you're someone's wife, husband or child. Or maybe you're on break or just don't have any connection with StarFleet at all. Ah, now it's time to relax in something a bit more comfortable. How about one of those nice leisure uniforms? You take the grey one, I'll take the brown. My, that's attractive. It could use a little accenting though. How about this flexible communicator pin? Now that's better.

Hey, you know what's really great about these clothes? They all match the furniture. Everything matches the furniture, actually. All the walls are off-white, that color you find on most personal computers these days. Very tasteful, unobtrusive, perfect for a ship with all the character of a Caribbean cruise ship or a floating office tower. Bland, abstract art for every room, lovely ergonomically designed furniture in shades of gray and beige. Knickknacks stored in little containers hidden in the walls. The light is soft and soothing. Have a seat, the doctor will see you shortly.

And speaking of the doctor, you couldn't possibly be sick. No, in this era, the human immune system has become a redundancy, something easily outdone by one of Doctor Crusher's fancy computer gizmos. Got a hangnail? Zap, it's gone. How about a broken leg? It'll be like new in a flash. No problem!

But a cold? How could you have a cold? Sit down and I'll give you computer diagnostic. This should not be happening. Think what could happen to you! You might sneeze, get a runny nose and have to deal with... oh, that stuff... you know, um. mucus.

It's not that bad? Nonsense — just like what you said about those bruises the other day. It's lucky you weren't written up for that episode the other night with your husband. Violence during sexual intercourse! That's unheard of! And to enjoy it? I think you might be in line for a visit to Counselor Troi.

Listening to the counselor, you quickly realize that your attitudes toward sexuality are in need of some serious revision. You're telling me you actually picture that lieutenant naked and masturbate to that image during your leisure time?

That is grossly inappropriate behavior for a StarFleet officer — objectifying a fellow officer and engaging in nonprocreative sexual activities! Where will your shining, perfect children come from if you continue this behavior? But let's cut this conversation short, sexuality has never amounted to more than one or two minuscule subplots on the show anyway.

Let's take a walk around the ship instead and take a gander at its famous diversity. Hmmm, interesting. We've passed around a hundred people by now, and a full 90 of them were humans. Funny, I thought this was a Federation starship. Aren't there supposed to be aliens working on this ship? Oh, well, as long as the quota gets met.

And speaking of quotas, it's impressive how many of these humans fall into the old racial category known as white. I guess this is some kind of attempt to make up for the fact that whites are outnumbered something like three to one on the old Blue Planet. They've got to have some turf to rule, you know!

Disgusted? I sure hope so. It's a shame that the show's producers came up with such a sterile, boring, unimaginative vision of the future. Now we have all these people going around thinking that's the wave of the future. They're working to get there. Just look at those modern office buildings. Don't tell me they don't look like Picard's ready room.

Cupid speaks

Laura Foster

Alright, listen up. I've had just about enough of this anti-Valentine bug that seems to be taking its toll on everyone, so let me just put down my bow and arrow for a minute to set some of you straight.

First of all, whoever said that Valentine's Day is only for people who have a significant other was way out of line and needs a serious talking to. True, you may not get the dozen roses, silk boxers, box of chocolates or whatever else happens to follow, but there are other aspects to the holiday that should not be overlooked.

Like those cute little Valentine hearts... who could resist... they're like candy canes on Christmas — you've just got to be excited about them. Has anyone noticed that they're getting rather risky these days — "Dig me??"... hmmm. Anyway, Valentine's is just one more sign that winter is almost over and the sub-Arctic temperatures that have frozen my face into an expression of hopelessness may now thaw. Isn't there some comfort in knowing there can be another justified reason to party in the middle of the week? How am I doing here? Well, let's just take a trip down memory lane...

Remember when we used to decorate shoe boxes with construction paper and glitter for our valentines? Then everyone would pass theirs out to one another (even to the kids you couldn't stand). And so by the time you went home, your box would be filled.

All those valentines mainly just had names and corny compliments, but we liked them just the same. And then there were the ones that had the extra X and O. They were serious because they meant that the giver liked you. Usually, it never turned into anything meaningful because it was discovered that the person had a terrible case of the cooties.

Well alright, so maybe we've grown up just a little and have gotten over the whole cootie complex, but why lose the spirit? There is no need to suddenly go into hibernation for the day as if it never existed. That's much too pathetic. Why not make the best of it? Ladies, I hear White Squall is good flick; cute guys shipwrecked, why not?

Guys, how about a night of poker and cigars — maybe one of those movies, need I say more? There are good times to be had, so enough of this moping around. Why not even send someone a valentine? If you're feeling a little bit daring add on that extra X & O.

Dancing the stress away

Are you ever angry?

Do you feel like slam dancing sometimes? Or throwing something? Or tackling someone? Or screaming at the top of your lungs?

Does the tension in your life make you feel claustrophobic? Like your heart is being squeezed? Your skull crushed? Your lungs collapsing under the pressure?

Do you listen to Nirvana or Nine Inch Nails when you feel this way? Do you sing/scream along and jump up and down to release the built up energy inside you?

Do you do cartwheels or pushups? Do you run or bike a few miles? Do you do anything you can to break out of the suffocating cell of anger and frustration that imprisons your soul?

And do those things work for you? Do they make you feel alive and calm you down at the same time?

If you've answered "yes" to any of these questions, not only do we have a lot in common, but you are also probably pretty lucky to be a part of this generation in this time, especially if you are female.

Our world today holds more pressures and concerns for the individual than it did in previous generations. With increased awareness of world problems and issues, the weight of responsibility for our planet, our country and our people rests on the shoulders of the individual.

Many of the changes in the 20th century which have made the world more stressful on individuals have been positive ones: some have not.

Politically speaking, we have been encouraged more than any other generation to vote and become involved because one vote can make a difference. Environmentally speaking, we have heard more than any other generation of the depletion and pollution of our resources: the individual has become capable of "saving the earth" through recycling, petitioning, boycotting, and becoming more educated about the environment.

For women, greater opportunities and options have created different and greater pressures than women had to deal with thirty years ago. Although things are slowly changing, many women are still expected to keep house while holding a career and receiving lower wages for equal work: Stress anyone?

Fortunately, even though the increase in pressure is undeniable, along with the pressure comes an increased acknowledgement and understanding of the effects of stress. Indeed, "stress" has become an important word in the American psyche and is known to cause and aggravate many physical ailments as well create emotional/psychological fatigue.

Once stress was determined as an important factor in the emotional and physical state of individuals, more and more methods of stress relief were introduced to the public. These methods are supposed to be healthy and safe ways to get rid of built-up anger and frustration as opposed to unhealthy ways such as smoking or overeating and unsafe ways such as child and spousal abuse.

"Fortunately, even though the increase in pressure is undeniable, along with the pressure comes an increased acknowledgement and understanding of the effects of stress."

Nicole Cournoyer

Today we are encouraged to show emotion more than our parents were. We are told that exercising is a good way to purge aggressive feelings. The popularity and acceptance of heavier, angrier music is a sign that many people turn to music to relieve their stress.

What's great about living in this time is that you can release your frustration whatever way works best for you, whether it's lying back listening to Enya or Beethoven or jumping around to Helmet or The Rollins Band. Stress relief is becoming an accepted and necessary part of our society.

For women, who 30 years ago were expected to look pretty and act like "ladies," slam dancing is a step up. Now we're able to vent our anger along with men, and men have more constructive ways of displacing their frustrations than beating on their wives, although too many still do not make use of these alternatives.

I'm grateful I was born into a time where I'm free to scream and jump around when I need to get out of my brain for a while. So when things get tense for you this semester, find a way to release your stress safely and effectively. Play a sport, go to a show, stare at the ceiling. Hell, dress up as the Easter Bunny and hide painted eggs all over campus if it helps.

As for me, if you see me running screaming through the campus center, just ignore me. It's medicinal.

Nicole Cournoyer is a Collegian columnist.

How I lost my valentine

Tara MK Connelly

My housemate once told me that when I get old I'll be a bitter and lonely woman surrounded only by my cats. I'll be that freaky elderly lady that shuffles around in her housecoat and curlers screeching, "Here kitty, kitty!" Neighborhood kids will hide in the bushes to watch me feed my felines and hurl cruel insults at me, which I won't hear because the other voice inside my head block them out.

My old maid status will constantly be hurled in my face every time a young couple strolls by my porch hand in hand or by mothers pushing baby carriages. I'll become embittered (well, more than I am now) and take to lovingly stroking my cat (Nigel Edwards the 16th) while rocking back and forth and back and forth and back and forth in my creaky rocking chair— creak, creak, creak.

But it's not like I don't have anyone — I did and he was a pretty great guy. I just suck at relationships and inevitably sabotage them. Case in point: the other morning he came to wake me up at 9 a.m. because he had a 10:10 a.m. class. He tried to wake me up not once but three times and when I finally did we almost missed the bus — his bus because I didn't have a class till 11 a.m.

But I still insisted that it was all his fault. His fault for not making me coffee, his fault for waking me up when he went to go running (thus making it hard for me to fall back asleep) and his fault for not trying harder to wake me up later on. Oh yeah, and his fault for making me stand in the cold and taking a bus when I hate public transportation.

I am not much of a morning person.

I then proceeded to not talk to him on the bus — even when the voice inside my head kept screaming: "You're wrong, it's your fault. Suck it up." But I love to argue (even with myself) and so in order to seemingly defy myself I was even more resolved not to say those two words that really, really kill me— "I'm sorry."

So we got off the bus, in silence, and I refused to walk with him across the street and now I'm sitting here knowing I blew it because I am a moron (bet you were thinking of another word, dear reader that rhymes with "itch.")

However, I honestly did try to apologize — really I did... okay, maybe it wasn't as direct as he wanted, but I have my pride too you know, and shouldn't I get bonus points for an attempt?

Blame it on my personality and the mixed messages the media sends me about a woman's role in society. Ever see that perfume commercial where you see a hard working business woman getting ready to go home and then she strips down to her underwear, doses herself in perfume and dons a trench coat so she can flash her loser boyfriend who's come to pick her up?

I mean, the song says, "I'm a hard working woman working nine to five..." Why?! So you can degrade yourself by flashing some pig in a Pontiac sunbird?

My point is, how do women know when to let guys be chivalrous and kind without fearing that their independence is being sucked away with every door that is opened or chair pushes in? And for that matter when does a guy know that it's okay for him to do those thing without fear that some irate Collegian columnist is going to bash him for his insensitivity?

My Mom said that guys like small women because they give them a sense of power. She warned me that guys won't let me do anything for myself and that I'll be smothered by over-protectiveness. Now, I'm paranoid. Every act of kindness is seen as a challenge of my strength and independence. I get mad, I fly off the handle, I get sarcastic, I bitch... I blame a perfectly nice person for ruining my morning and making it too cold outside.

Plus, it's Valentine's Day and I actually had a date. It's all my fault and maybe my housemate was right...

"Here, kitty, kitty!"

The Puerto Rican alien

The question has been posed as to whether Puerto Ricans can become illegal/foreign aliens in the United States. For those multiculturalists who continue to affirm a separate Puerto Rican identity within the English speaking territories of America, this has always been the case for the Puerto Rican, according to these ideologies, has and continues to live in a bilingual ideological space at the margins of the State. Ironically, rather than questioning the meaning of Anglo-America, these reformers suggest a pluralization of the meanings of the American, inclusive of marginal identities and bizarre cultural distinctions which border the pathological.

However, most Puerto Rican nutiliculteralists, who for the most part hyphenate their identities, are not articulating a political stance. The extent of struggle becomes a mere institutionalization of diversity.

The question becomes, why do Puerto Rican multiculteralists continue to operate in a political space other than the Puerto Rican citizenship? I mean are Puerto Rican cultural nationalists willing to renounce their U.S. citizenship and become foreigners and aliens? What would it mean to actually become a Puerto Rican citizen, a member of a separate nation, a political being existing outside the juridical margins of the United States?

I mean what would it mean to Farrakhan to become an African citizen? Why don't the white conservative Anglo-Americans that so greatly value the Eurocentric experience, return to England, or Europe?

"For island born Puerto Ricans, anyone who is born outside the island is considered an "extranjero" or foreigner. Does the same apply for English speaking Americans? "

Charles R. Venator Santiago

Clearly, there are other issues at stake. Perhaps it is in this hypocrisy, in this irony, in this paradox, where we can further see the fragility of multicultists.

It is at this gate, at this entrance to the political space of action and commitment, where we begin to distinguish the legitimate defense for a separate identity and difference.

With the legalization of a Puerto Rican citizenship, the hyphenated Puerto Rican, much like all other hyphenated cultural pluralists, has encountered a gateway into separation or continued marginalization. The question is are Puerto Ricans ready to make that commitment to become a native alien, a foreigner, an immigrant subject to the borders of a Proposition 187?

Thus returning to our question, can a Puerto Rican be come a foreign alien if he decides to renounce his US citizenship? Traditionally, if one is not a US citizen, one is labeled an alien, foreigner, immigrant, etc.

However, in the case of Puerto Rico, one of 2,200 island possessions of the US, can we articulate this political distinction? For island-born Puerto Ricans, anyone who is born outside the island is considered an "extranjero" or foreigner. Does the same apply for English-speaking Americans? Can a native born individual become an alien in his own homeland? Clearly the natives of this current nation became aliens in their own homes primarily by virtue of conquest. Are cultural pluralists, and cultural nationalists, willing to actualize their political rhetoric? Or are they going to continue to articulate positions at the ideological margins of the State?

I think the answer is clear, for the most part. Anglo- Americans of Puerto Rican heritage are neither willing nor able to become aliens in their own home. This clearly leaves one legitimate political alternative for the cultural pluralist, namely to begin to redefine what Anglo-America is, and to recognize their Americanness for what it is and what It could become.

Letters to the Editor

Keep it up

To the editor:

It looks like Marty Jones of the Minuteman hungerfest is back. While this guy is clearly a nut-case lunatic with no life, his activities should be encouraged, not discouraged. After all, this is America, the home of the free and the land of opportunity. While his World for President campaign is nothing more than a one-man scam for publicity, he has every right under the Constitution to make a complete ass out of himself. Maybe he's trying to impress a cute blonde on campus somewhere. Anyway, I happen to like the "Martin Jones Show." We could all use a good laugh now and then. In the case of Marty "M.F." Jones, you're talking mass hysteria. Keep it up Marty. We all love you. Really, we do.

Reform bill opposition

To the editor:

The reason I am writing this letter is because of two dreams I have had. In these dreams, old childhood memories came alive again. The first dream was of an older childhood friend who gave me a plastic model of the wolfman that he had assembled and painted and that I had rediscovered in my attic the day before I had my dream. My feelings during the dream were of the childhood happiness at having received the gift and of an explicable and disturbing sadness. When I woke up, the reasons for the sadness would hit me, the real life gift-giver was later to come back from Vietnam in pieces in a body bag.

On the following night, I dreamt of another childhood memory, this time of my older friend's father. In the dream I remembered how I had once seen him counting change in order to buy bread at the corner bakery and how it was then that I had first noticed the two fingers he had lost while working as a laborer building Route 195. When these two dreams repeated themselves on subsequent nights, they motivated me to find out what had happened to this family that I had otherwise long forgotten.

The childhood friend's father is no longer living and his mother is in a nursing home where she talks and acts as if she were once again either a seamstress at a local garment shop or a child in a little village on the island of Sao Miguel daily feeding the chickens and milking the goats. Old neighbors tell me that since notification of her only son's death, she was never quite the same, that her spirit had been broken. The money that she and her husband had saved has long since disappeared into the nursing home coffers and she is now, as are the vast majority of nursing home residents, on Medicaid. Welfare "reform" bill that passed the Republican controlled Congress would eliminate legal immigrant eligibility for almost all federal programs including the Medicaid upon which this woman's survival depends. President Clinton has vetoed this bill but is still under pressure to renegotiate its contents with the Republicans in Congress. Republican Congressman Peter Blute has voted for these punitive measures but it's not too late for him to change his position. I urge everyone to call him and demand that he do so.

My childhood friend was not the only legal resident alien to be drafted to fight in Vietnam, and I don't know how many other mothers of legal resident aliens sacrificed their only son in the name of our country, but I do know that I will do everything in my power to prevent this woman, and others like her, from now being used as a scapegoat. That is why I have informed Peter Blute of my strong opposition to this morally repugnant Republican welfare "reform" bill and why I am encouraging others to do so as well, in order that I may be able to sleep at night without forsaking my soul.

To the editor:

I am writing to respond to the article published by Hussein Ibish on the Black Affairs page on Dec. 13. I do not wish to attack Mr. Ibish and state why his propaganda spreads hatred toward Jews on campus, because I feel that it is obvious to any intelligent person. I wish to address an issue that has not been discussed at UMass. This issue is the historic coalition between African-Americans and Jews to support the State of Israel. Seeing this particular article on the Black Affairs Page infuriated me because it states an opinion which is totally antithetical to the actions of the mainstream black community over the last 50 years. There are many issues of utmost concern to the black community that should be printed on the Black affairs Page and Mr. Ibish's rhetoric does not address any black issue at all.

Based on the articles I have read, there has been a mutually beneficial relationship between Jews and African Americans to support the State of Israel in the past 50 years. The late Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. acknowledged the similarities between the goals of African-Americans and that of Zionism. Just 10 days before Dr. King was assassinated, he stated, "I see Israel as one of the great outposts of democracy in the world, and a marvelous example of what can be done, how a desert land can be transformed into an oasis of brotherhood and democracy."

Dr. King also responded to allegations such as the ones Mr. Ibish stated by saying in a Harvard University address in 1968. "When people criticize Zionism, they mean Jews. You are talking anti-Semitism." As Dr. King stated, Mr. Ibish's propaganda is clearly anti-Semitic. When Zionism has been compared to racism, other black leaders such as former New York City Mayor David Dinkins have stated. "Zionism is not racism, but the legitimate expression of the Jewish people's self-determination." The late former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan said, "As a black American who understands racism, I know that it makes no sense to equate it with Zionism."

The Congressional Black Caucus, A group of black Congressmen and Senators, has the best voting record on Israel of any organized group in the United States Congress. Led by Representative John Lewis from Georgia and Representative Major Owens from New York, the Black Caucus has worked with pro-Israel organizations such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee to support foreign aid to Israel, loan guarantees to Israel, and the Foreign Embassy Relocation Act. Many black Congressmen have been to Israel and have seen with their own eyes the importance of Israel to America and the international Jewish community.

Israel has supported Africa in numerous efforts such as giving thousands of Africans job training in Israel. In fact, Israel has hosted over 45,000 trainees from Africa and Israeli experts have worked in nations across the African continent. Israel has taken in thousands of Ethiopian Jews and integrated them into Israeli society. In times of crisis such as epidemics, famine, and wars, Israel has provided support and sent an abundance of relief and medical supplies to Africa.

In conclusion, I am outraged that Mr. Ibish's piece was published on the Black Affairs page. Mr. Ibish's opinions are the total opposite of great black civil rights leaders such as Martin Luther King and John Lewis and have no place on a Black Affairs page of any newspaper. I challenge the Massachusetts Daily Collegian to complete the internal investigation of this incident which they promised would be conducted in the Dec. 14 issue. I challenge students of all races and religions on this campus to stand up against this indignity and work for civility in relations on this campus.

Oscar hopefuls learn their fate

By John Horn
Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Braveheart, actor-director Mel Gibson's battlefield epic about 13th century Scotland, captured a leading 10 Academy Award nominations today, including best picture. It will be up against Apollo 13, Babe, Sense and Sensibility and Italy's The Postman for the year's best movie.

Academy voters spread the top bids across a spectrum of titles but shunned some early Oscar favorites.

Gibson learned of the nominations for Braveheart when an assistant gave him a hand signal while he was filming a scene for his new movie, Ransom, in New York.

"I went right ahead with the scene. It really didn't hit me at first," Gibson said during a break. "It's a great feeling. To get 10 picture nominations, that's a nice even number."

Massimo Troisi was nominated for best actor in The Postman, the first posthumous lead acting selection in 20 years. The actor, who died at age 41 just 12 hours after filming ended, also shared a screenwriting credit with four co-writers of the movie.

"We're feeling a mix of crossed emotions," his sister, Rosaria Troisi, told the Italian news agency AGI. "It's a very great satisfaction, but satisfaction doesn't signify joy."

Also nominated for best actor were Nicolas Cage in Leaving Las Vegas, Richard Dreyfuss in Mr. Holland's Opus, Anthony Hopkins in Nixon and Sean Penn in Dead Man Walking. Emma Thompson was nominated for best actress for Sense and Sensibility, and for writing the film's script — an Oscar first for an actress. She faces Susan

COURTESY CLIVE COOTE

Sense and Sensibility's seven Oscar nominations include ones for both Emma Thompson and Kate Winslet.

Sarandon in Dead Man Walking, Elisabeth Shue in Leaving Las Vegas, Sharon Stone in Casino and Meryl Streep in The Bridges of Madison County.

Apollo 13 collected nine nominations and Babe and Sense and Sensibility each got seven. The best picture nomination for The Postman was the first foreign-language nominee in the top category since Cries and Whispers in 1973. No foreign-language film has ever taken the best picture statuette. The best picture nominations encompass a broad range of stories: Braveheart is a bloody epic about Scottish rebellion; Apollo 13 retells the harrowing true story of astronauts trapped in a dying spacecraft; Sense and Sensibility is a lush period film exploring unrequited — and eventually requited — love; The Postman is about the unexpected friendship of an exiled Chilean poet and a mail carrier in a remote town; and Babe is a computer-enhanced adaptation of the children's barnyard book Babe, the Gallant Pig.

"The little pig has gone a long way," said Babe's barnyard straight man, James Cromwell, who received a best supporting actor nomination.

Some films once considered favorites did poorly in the voting by the 5,043 voters of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. The American President collected just one nomination, as did The Bridges of Madison County and Casino.

Tom Hanks, winner of the last two best actor Oscars for Philadelphia and Forrest Gump, will not have a chance for his third straight. Apollo 13 failed to launch a third consecutive bid.

Even though Leaving Las Vegas was not picked for best picture, as was widely expected, director Mike

Cajun Beausoleil incites dance fever at local club with energizing music

By Jennifer Howell

BEAUSOLEIL
IRON HORSE
FEB. 12

NORTHAMPTON — "Johnny ne peut pas danser" (Johnny can't dance) was one of the first songs played by popular Cajun band Beausoleil in its Monday night performance at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. The audience, however, could and did dance the night away as Beausoleil played song after danceable song.

From the first strains of the fiddle and beats of the drum, dancers took the floor, caught the beat and didn't stop until Beausoleil finished five encores at the end of the nearly three-hour show.

Two-stepping and waltzing around the sometimes jam- packed dance floor, the dancers were as enjoyable to watch as the band, and it was clear the band appreciated the audience's skill and enthusiasm.

For non-dancers there was still much to enjoy in the show. The band's rhythm was infectious. Doucet's fiddle-playing was impassioned, energetic and often highlighted. The vocals and lyrics, whether in English or rapid-fire French, were clear and entertaining.

The band members worked together flawlessly, creating an uninterrupted flow of seamless music. And to those eager to meet Beausoleil, the band's members were personable, approachable and seemed genuinely happy to meet their fans.

COURTESY RICK OLIVIER

Beausoleil performed an energetic set at the Ironhorse.

Soon to celebrate their 20th anniversary as a band, Beausoleil demonstrated their versatility, playing an mix of Cajun songs. Choices ranged from old recordings from Cajun artists of the 1920s and 30s to songs from their latest releases. They even threw in two songs from a recent children's album, Le Hoogie Boogie. Some of the highlights of the evening were the band's renditions of their newer songs including, "Sofie," "La Danse de la Vie" and "I Fall on My Knees."

Beausoleil's performance was the first in the Iron Horse's Mardi Gras Fest (Zydeco and Cajun Dance Series). Two other shows will follow this month——— Terrance Simien and the Mallet Playboys on Feb. 15 and Buckwheat Zydeco on Feb 26. If the energetic performance of Beausoleil is any indication of the quality of shows to come in the series, the good times will roll at the Iron Horse this February.

Napalm to light up area

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

For every genre of music there is a band or person who is responsible for starting it all. In most cases, bands are weak copies of the original however, if the above is true, then Napalm Death are the undisputed kings of death metal ur grindcore. Just like The Beatles are rock and Run DMC are rap, Napalm Death is death metal.

Napalm Death started off in England in 1981 as a punk band heavily influenced by groups like Crass. However in 1986 original drummer Rat left the band and the infamous Mick Harris joined the trio. Harris along with Nick Bullen and Justin Broadrick transformed Napalm Death from a second rate punk band into a machine of terror.

Feeling that punk had become too stylistic, Napalm Death attempted to play their instruments as fast as humanly possible. They also began to shift their influences from The Dead Kennedys to Celtic Frost. Napalm Death represented aggression in a way that no one had ever heard before.

The band was the kings of the U.K. scene for years. Despite successful European tours with groups like S.O.B. Entombed and Bolt Thrower, Napalm Death didn't play in the United States until 1990.

Once they arrived in the states they found a huge following and the American death scene had flourished. This produced a massive U.S. tour with Godflesh and Nocturnus. Despite their success, Harris left. He was quickly replaced by Danny Herrera and Napalm Death continued their touring.

Napalm Death continue their brand of metal with their latest release Diatribes. While the new LP shows off a slower side to Napalm Death, it is classic death metal at it's best. Furthermore Napalm Death continues to stay true to their roots by bringing New York hardcore veterans Sheer Terror on their U.S. tour. Mayhem and destruction will rule Pearl Street as Napalm Death makes a stop over.

Napalm Death, Sheer Terror, Hate Breed, and Converge perform at Pearl Street Feb. 15. Tickets are $9 in advance and $11 at the door. The show is all ages. Call the club at 584-7771 for more information.

ROMY BARTZAY / COLLEGIAN

Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds entertained a sold out audience at Amherst College Sunday night.

Matthews excels at Amherst

Tim Reynolds joins popular singer for acoustic concert

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

DAVE MATTHEWS & TIM REYNOLDS
LeFrak Gymnasium
Feb. 11

When Dave Matthews decided to team up with long time friend and musical partner, Tim Reynolds, for an all acoustical college tour, the idea in and of itself was brilliant.

Reynolds is a first rate guitarist with exceptional skills and the ability to create and imitate other instruments with ease and effort. Combined with Matthews careful crooning and lyrical abilities, the two were a stunning display of musical mastery.

However, the dynamic duo tried to create an intimate setting in a very un-intimate place, losing a lot of its audience in the process and handicapping what would have otherwise been an excellent show.

Illuminated by a single bedside lamp and soft colored gels, the two put on an outstanding set playing a lot of original material along with the more popular tracks from the Dave Matthews Band's latest album, Under The Table and Dreaming.

After thanking the unruly crowd for it's patience, Matthews introduced Reynolds as "a long time chum" he's known for "about 10 years." After dedicating the first song to his sister, the two began playing as if they were just jamming in their living room — a feeling interrupted only by the thunderous applause at the end of each song.

"Satellite" garnered the most appreciation by the crowd despite Matthews' shaky beginning. The chorus was a bit faster in tempo than the album version as his voice soared over the crowd's vocal accompaniment.

"Blue Water" tested Matthews ability to scale the higher notes and "Typical Situation" had everyone on their feet. This was followed by a solo from Reynolds that left no doubt in anyone's mind that he was a true virtuoso.

The sounds gleaned from the six strings of his guitar mimicking that of a steel guitar, a flute and yes, even a violin. His fingers flew and never faulted, making it look as effortless as breathing.

After his solo, Matthews dubbed Reynolds, "Superman" and said that the crowd's response "uplifted their spirits" — something he and Reynolds needed after a rather dry reception in Minnesota.

"What Would You Say," "Warehouse" and "Jimmy Thing" all off Under the Table were all great sounding. "Warehouse" began like a storm off shore building in size and sound before crashing into a tension breaking chorus which lightened up the mood and complimented the song perfectly.

Matthews and Reynolds bantered with the crowd, but fans in the back of the gym lost most of the quiet dialogue, hearing only mumbling. Even after the sound was turned up, it was hard to hear some of the lyrics and on-stage jokes. The evening would have been more appreciated at a smaller venue, however the staff did an admirable job of getting people settled and under control.

Matthews closed the show with the ever popular "Ants Marching" and finished up with another solo by Reynolds and one more song. The audience left knowing they had witnessed a stellar performance.

A look at cheap software to improve computers

No one needs to spend big money on suites of utility applications when there are tons of inexpensive shareware and freeware packages available.

Everyone needs a zipping application to compress files.

Compressing files are important when you want to transfer files which will not fit on a floppy, or when you want to keep on-line transfer times down.

Matthew Wurtzel

Quite possibly the best zipping package available is WinZip.

WinZip operates as a stand alone application in Windows, or as part of the File Manager or Explorer depending upon the version of Windows.

Both versions of WinZip for Windows 3.1 and Windows 95 operate exactly the same, except the version for Windows 95 allows for the long file names.

The only drawback to WinZip is that it's not very intuitive. The myriad options are liable to confuse an inexperienced user.

However, the basics are quite easy to learn. Unzipping files is simple, but zipping them is the hard part. B

Transferring files

Once you have an application to zip files, you might need one to transfer them across the Internet.

A freeware file transfer application which the Office of Information and Telecommunication at the University of Massachusetts usually supplies students when they obtain a World Wide Web account is WS FTP.

This application is feature rich, very intuitive and available for both versions of Windows. Although Windows 95 comes with a file transfer application, it pales in comparison to other FTP applications.

The program window is split between the local system hard drive, and the Internet server.

Files can easily be transferred by highlighting it and simply pressing the arrow button in the direction of the transfer.

The application allows for the creation of new directories on the local drive, and renaming files on both the server and local drive. B+

Emulators

Another free application which the University gives students is EWAN, emulator without a name.

There are few emulators available, but EWAN is the best one.

Although EWAN was designed for Windows 3.1, version 1.052 operates flawlessly on Windows 95 — note the University may still be offering an older version.

Like most emulators EWAN is simple.

Windows 95 users may want to consider downloading a copy rather then using MS Telnet which comes with the operating system. A-

Most of these applications are free, or cost a small fee.

All the applications are available on the Internet at various Web sites and FTP sites.

All these applications are available at http://www.wlyn.com/stroud/cwsa.html where you can find out more information about these programs and others.

BROKEN ARROW
Directed by John Woo
with John Travolta & Christian Slater
Playing at Mt. Forms Four

With his latest film, Broken Arrow, John Woo will no longer just be called a great Hong Kong director, but a great Hollywood director as well.

John Travolta stars as Vic Deakins, an officer who has been in the military for 20 years. Driven by avarice and the power-hungry desire to play God, he plots to steal two of the government's nuclear bombs. On a practice stealth mission, Deakins sabotages his plane and crashes it in a Utah desert, making sure that he gets out safely with the stolen bombs — or what the military refers to as a "broken arrow."

His plans are waylaid when his co-pilot, Riley Hale (Christian Slater) also gets out safely, determined to thwart Deakins' plan. Slater then teams up with a Utah desert ranger (Samantha Mathis), and together they risk life and limb to recover the bombs.

For the majority of the movie, the two are shot at, smacked around and nearly blown up by Deakins and his team of ex-military terrorists, including his brawny right- hand man, ex-L.A. Raider, Howie Long. The hazards they encounter include helicopter catastrophes, maimed bad guys and even a nuclear explosion.

John Travolta stars in Broken Arrow with Christian Slater.

Woo's second state-side venture is unrelenting with his use of non-stop action. His first Hollywood picture, Hard Target with Jean-Claude Van Damme, showcased many of the auteur's tricks, but wound up being just mediocre compared to his Cantonese action films.

The director is the father of modern action cinema. Hollywood notables like Robert Rodriguez and Quentin Tarantino owe much of their style to Woo and his ingenious craftsmanship. With films like The Killer, A Better Tomorrow II and Hard Boiled, Woo became a legend in Hong Kong but remains only a cult favorite in the States.

Some of Woo's success is due to his frequent use of actor Chow Yun-Fat. The problem with Broken Arrow is that Woo tries to conform Travolta into a Chow Yun-Fat-type of character, and he doesn't quite fit the mold.

Scripted by the same writer, Graham Yost, the comparisons of Broken Arrow to Speed are inevitable. Slater coins a decent action hero, with his acting talents surpassing that of Speed demon Keanu Reeves. In her second role as Slater's love interest (her first in Pump Up the Volume), Mathis threatens to tread in the footsteps of the popular female victim, Sandra Bullock. Like Bullock, Mathis has that cute, not overly attractive visage, and friendly persona that plays more realistic as the female lead character than past film divas.

The violence in Broken Arrow is eerily original. Death scenes involve all-new horrible methods. Woo stays true to his style — using slo-mo shots of Deakins smoking cigarettes, having Hale leaping horizontally while double- fisting firearms and keeping the body count high.

Though Broken Arrow is more about raw action than a compelling story, the film's energy and Woo's visuals are ample entertainment. Like all action films, without a suspension of disbelief, the ride would be far too unbelievable. A-

Figgis was nominated for best director. He faces Gibson, Babe's Chris Noonan, The Postman's Michael Radford and actor Tim Robbins, who directed Dead Man Walking.

Figgis speculated that Leaving Las Vegas, the story of a an end-of-the-line alcoholic, was too tough for the Academy's many older members.

"I hear that at some of the screenings they'll get up and walk out," Figgis said. He said the films that did get nominations exuded "freshness."

The supporting acting nominees are first-time Oscar honorees: James Cromwell in Babe, Ed Harris in Apollo 13, Brad Pitt in 12 Monkeys, Tim Roth in Rob Roy and Kevin Spacey in The Usual Suspects.

Joan Allen was nominated for best supporting actress for Nixon, as were Kathleen Quinlan for Apollo 13, Mira Sorvino in Mighty Aphrodite, Mare Winningham for Georgia and Kate Winslet for Sense and Sensibility.

The Netherlands' Antonia's Line was nominated for foreign language film, where it faces Sweden's All Thing's Fair, Algeria's Dust of Life, Brazil's O Quatrilho and Italy's The Star Maker. The Postman was not in the running in this category because it was released in Italy in 1994.

Troisi's posthumous nomination for the 68th annual awards puts the late Italian actor in select Oscar company. The last posthumous best actor nominee was Peter Finch, who won in 1976 won for Network. Other posthumous nominees include James Dean, Spencer Tracy and, for best supporting actor, Sir Ralph Richardson. Woody Allen, nominated for writing Mighty Aphrodite, tied filmmaker Billy Wilder for most career nominations for screenplay, with 12.

In addition to picture and directing, Braveheart was nominated for cinematography, costumes, editing, makeup, original score, sound, sound effects editing and original screenplay. Several of 1995's highest grossing films also were largely overlooked. Batman Forever earned three nominations, and Pocahontas got two. Waterworld, the most expensive movie ever made, drew just one nomination, for sound.

The original screenplay nominations were Braveheart, Mighty Aphrodite, Nixon, Toy Story and The Usual Suspects.

The adapted screenplay picks were Apollo 13, Babe, Leaving Las Vegas, The Postman and Sense and Sensibility.

There was little controversy around the documentary feature nominations, unlike last year when the celebrated Hoop Dreams was overlooked, triggering revision of the category's nomination procedures. The nominees were Anne Frank Remembered, The Battle Over Citizen Kane, Fiddlefest, Hank Aaron: Chasing the Dream and Troublesome Creek: A Midwestern.

Academy voters did not embrace most of the prestige projects released late in the year. Only one best picture selection — Sense and Sensibility — was released in December, and the four others came out in August or earlier.

The selections cap weeks of expensive jockeying for the coveted nominations.

Miramax Films spent a reported $1.5 million campaigning for its movie The Postman, and MGM has spent several hundred thousand dollars promoting Leaving Las Vegas. Even though critics have raved about both films, neither has taken in more than $16 million at movie theaters.

In awards announced earlier, Kirk Douglas and animator Chuck Jones will receive honorary Oscars, and John Lasseter, the director of Toy Story, is the recipient of a special Oscar for his work on the computer-animated film. Donald C. Rogers will receive the Gordon E. Sawyer Award for his contribution to motion picture sound technology.

This year's Oscars will be presented March 25 at the Los Angeles Music Center. Whoopi Goldberg will be host of the show, televised live by ABC. Academy Awards in technical categories will be given out March 2.

Several rules were changed this year, including the renaming of two categories.

The original song score category has become the original music or comedy score and the original score category has become original dramatic score.

A total of 255 feature-length films met general eligibility requirements this year, the highest total since 1988, when 270 were eligible.

'Bama here we come!

Lianne Lang and the UMass women's gymnastics team are preparing for this weekend's big match against top-ranked Alabama.

Eckersley reunited with former coach; Courier

ST. LOUIS (AP) — The St. Louis Cardinals completed a long-rumored deal for relief pitcher Dennis Eckersley today, acquiring him from the Oakland Athletics for minor-league reliever Steve Montgomery.

Eckersley, 41, replaces Tom Henke, who announced last month that he would not return for the beginning of the season and likely has retired for good. Henke refused an arbitration offer from St. Louis and could not play for the Cardinals until May 1.

Eckersley is fourth on the career saves list with 323, including 29 last year to lead the Athletics for the ninth consecutive season. With the Cardinals he is reunited with manager Tony La Russa and pitching coach Dave Duncan.

One of the sticking points in the deal was that the Cardinals wanted the Athletics to pay part of Eckersley's $2.25 million salary. As a player with five years with the same team and 10 years in the major leagues, Eckersley could have vetoed any deal. He has said that the only place he wanted to go was St. Louis. From 1988-93, Eckersley had four 40-plus save seasons and he had a career-high 51 saves in 1992. He's pitched in five league championship series and three World Series for Oakland from 1988-90, and he's a six-time All-Star.

In 1992, when he was 7-1 with a 1.91 ERA, he became the ninth pitcher in major league history to win the MVP and Cy Young awards in the same season. In his 21-year career, Eckersley has also pitched for Cleveland, Boston and the Chicago Cubs and has a record of 192-159 with a 3.45 ERA.

He was used primarily as a starter through 1986, winning a career-high 20 games with Boston in 1978. He was converted to a reliever in 1987 and has earned 320 of his 323 saves since then. Montgomery, 25, was the Cardinals' third-round draft pick in the June 1992 free agent draft. He led the Double-A Texas League with 36 saves last season for Arkansas.

Montgomery has a career record of 14-11 with 41 saves and a 3.25 ERA in three minor-league seasons.

Courier loses to Spaniard

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates (AP) — Alberto Berasategui of Spain beat third-seeded Jim Courier 7-5, 7-6 (7-5) yesterday in the first upset of the $1 million Dubai Open.

German Bernd Karbacher beat Dino Pescario of Romania 6-4, 6-4. Berasategui served and volleyed flamboyantly in the 102-minute match to beat Courier, a former world No. 1.

After losing the first set, the 25-year-old Courier made a valiant attempt to fight his way back into the match.

purpose.

"It's punishment for losing the first night," he said.

• In years of attending hockey games, I've never heard a scratched player cheered during pre-game introductions. That changed Monday with a rousing ovation for Travis Roy.

• In this strife-filled season for the Terriers, it's ironic that J.P McKersie was in goal when BU claimed its 19th Beanpot. McKersie's career was presumed to be over after being struck by a car two years ago. His mother flew out from Madison, Wis. to see her son bring home the historic first Beanpot in the FleetCenter.

• Last week, the Beanpot had an announced sell-out crowd of 17,565. This was also the attendance figure for the recent NHL All-Star game and the Bruins opening game in their new home, so it's safe to say that 17,565 IS the building's maximum capacity for hockey. So, why was the attendance at the championship game listed as 18,0657 The FleetCenter does not have standing room, and was not renovated this past week. Where did these extra 500 seats come from?

• The WABU broadcast crew outdid itself by dressing in tuxedos for the event. The tuxes were not only sported by the talent and studio hosts, but also by members of the crew.

It probably went unnoticed. During the third period, press box TVs were found tuned to the ESPYs, a game pitting NHL cellar-dwellers Ottawa and the New York Islanders, and even the Weather Channel. Anything but the Beanpot.

• While he might not live up to his "Hobey Dobey" moniker, Husky co-captain Dan McGillis, proved to be a fiery leader as he almost single-handedly led Northeastern's comeback attempt, spurring on the Huskies.

McGillis played an inspired first period tallying a pair of goals and playing solid two-way hockey. He aggressively checked at both ends of the ice and convinced his team that their early 3-0 deficit was not insurmountable.

A Hobey Baker winner he is not, but McGillis is still one of the top defensemen in the country and at 6-foot-2-inches, 200 pounds, has as good of a shot as any collegiate defenseman of having a solid professional career.

• BU scored six goals on its first 11 shots in the second period. One FleetCenter official was overheard asking how much better the Celtics would be if they could do that.

• One tremendous disappointment from the Beanpot was the reaction to Chris Drury's hat-trick. Exactly three hats landed on the ice. To the credit of BU students in the balcony though, that's quite a throw and many hats were spotted cascading downwards and landing in the Club seats.

• Another unusual Beanpot occurrence came when Northeastern goaltender Todd Reynolds pulled himself from the net. After giving up five goals in 9:55 (the last of which was scored by BU thug Brendan Walsh) Reynolds just left the crease and skated to the bench, taking off his helmet.

• Bob Ryan of the Boston Globe is an excellent writer, with his knowledge of basketball in particular casting him as one of the sport's leading authorities on numerous talk shows and in many publications. However, while many people in his position branch out into areas they should not enter into, he knows his place.

Ryan wrote a strong sidebar, at the final, about the rivalry between Parker and Smith, which appeared in yesterday's edition. It was a well-done piece on two old co-workers and rivals, where the fact that they specifically are hockey coaches, as opposed to football or water polo, is irrelevant.

When it comes to following hockey he never pretends to be an expert. Waiting for the start of the post-game press conference, he talked about Reynolds' self-dismissal with WBZ's Scott Wahle and added that "I've never seen it before, but that doesn't mean much coming from me."

This modesty separates Ryan from other well known area writers who enter into territory not meant for them. Ryan dabbles well without biting off more than he can chew.

• Some doubted if the change of venue from the venerable and cramped old Garden to the palatial new FleetCenter would effect this tournament and its intensity. In the end, a lack-luster consolation game played before friends and family was followed by a frenzied championship game won handily by BU.

The more things change, the more they stay the same.

That all changes when they enter Chaney's realm. For his players, Chaney is a coach, a teacher and a father figure. He's not the "go to the ballgame with, talk about girls with," pal-type of dad, but the "tough, disciplinarian, so hard-lined that you're afraid to do something wrong," type of father.

For the kids that come in, never having had that kind of order in their lives, they embrace it. He has taken many wayward boys that come into his program and turned them into men, that emerge as productive members of society.

"He equips you more for manhood than for the NBA," former Owl Michael Harden told Sports Illustrated in 1994. "On most NBA teams it's all free-flow. Temple players aren't used to that. They're used to structure. It becomes a habit to do what you've been told rather than to improvise. But out in society everyone of them is making a positive impact. I love the man. When you play for him, you have your own world and you don't trust anybody on the outside. And after a while the worst thing's not when he yells at you— it's when he doesn't. We knew he loved us."

Harden's praise is shared by many former players including current NBAers Mark Macon, Eddie Jones and Aaron McKie, as well as many colleagues.

"A message about life everyday," said fellow Big 5 coach Speedy Morris, of LaSalle. "How many coaches give their kids that?"

When McKie came to Temple as a freshman, he had no parents. His father died when he was young and his mother abandoned him. He was on a misguided course in his life until he surfaced at Temple. After a career of Chaney's 5:30 a.m. practices, McKie was not only ready for the NBA, but to be a responsible adult.

The goal of the early practices is twofold. Battling at that hour toughens you up. It also allows Chaney to institute mandatory hour-and-a-half study halls at hours that other teams are in the gym. If one players cuts class, the whole team runs. It doesn't happen often.

Not that Chaney sacrifices winning for character building. His numbers speak for themselves. Among active coaches John Chaney ranks sixth in career wins. He was National Coach of the Year in 1988, guiding the Owls to a 32-2 record. His Owls have made the NCAA tournament 11 of his 13 seasons.

Before Temple he coached at Cheyney State, where he took his team to the 1977-78 National Title.

He hasn't done it with blue-chippers either. Macon is the only high school All-American to come to North Philadelphia. But the combination of the effective zone defense, and Chaney's ability to squeeze every drop of ability out of his players, has kept the wins coming and the Owls in the national spotlight.

Massachusetts backers rave about the tough schedule that the team plays every year, but the concept was practically invented by Chaney. The Owls' out-of-conference schedule is regularly among the toughest in the nation. This season is a perfect example with games against Villanova, Kansas, Memphis, Cincinnati, Oklahoma State and Duke.

In a world of slick, polished "made for TV" coaches, John Chaney is a dying breed. While other coaches are doing commercials for tacos and shoes, he still dodges what he considers unnecessary attention. He is a man that cares not for image or for what other people think.

Chaney is a character. A press conference with him is entirely unpredictable, making him a beat writer's dream. Perhaps Philadelphia Inquirer sports writer Bill Lyon summed up Chaney appropriately.

"John Chaney, the wonderful old grump that coaches Temple."

Matt Vautour is a Collegian columnist.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — Serious talks about work, money and romance take place today. Do not let someone's flattery undermine your good judgement. It is possible that this person has ulterior motives.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — You have secret ambitions that need to find concrete expression. Fresh projects begun in recent weeks, but do not start something new. Playing board games with your children will teach them how to strategize.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Do what you can to assist a worthy social program. Your practicality helps you get ahead at work. Curb a tendency to act headstrong. You have more career options than you think. Do some investigating.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Some risk-taking is fine, but out-and-out gambling is strictly taboo. Loved ones will welcome some extra attention this evening. Share a health idea with someone close to your heart.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Old friends are the best judges of how good a plan will be for you. Tell them the whole story. A scholastic or financial decision should not be made in haste.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — School activities attract your attention. Your mate's cooperation is central to what you hope to accomplish. Tie up loose ends before beginning a project.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Continue to explore your professional options. A confident, take-charge approach will open new doors. Repay favors. Consult your mate or partner if pondering a change in lifestyle.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — Keep your ideas under wraps lest you reveal your hand to the competition. Someone's public statements may be a smoke screen. Refrain from going into debt.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — Others may be too absorbed in their own affairs to show much interest in your plans. Avoid acting offended. This is not a good time to take monetary risks.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — A policy of cooperation and good will is best for your purposes. Safeguard your financial future by steering clear of speculative ventures. Put romance on hold while you focus on a health or education issue.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — Business comes before pleasure now and will be far more profitable! Originality and daring are the main ingredients for success. Do not allow yourself to be distracted when traveling.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Continue to follow the path the best results. Financial matters claim your attention, for both business and domestic reasons. A new trend is developing at a place of employment.

UM hopes to continue home streak vs. Dukes

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will look to keep its home unbeaten streak alive tonight when the Duquesne Lady Dukes invade the friendly confines of the William D. Mullins Center for the first time this season.

The Minutewomen (15-7, 6-4 Atlantic 10) are looking for their 11th consecutive win at home, and they will be led by Atlantic 10 Player of the Week Octavia Thomas.

Thomas came up big for Massachusetts last week, leading the Minutewomen in scoring in their games against Temple and Xavier.

In a 78-51 thrashing of the Owls, Thomas scored 16 points and in a 75-56 victory over the Musketeers, Thomas netted 23. For the last three games, Thomas has been the Minutewomen's top scorer.

With sophomore Tez Kraft out of the line-up for the rest of the season, freshman Jaywana Bradley has moved into the starting rotation. She is averaging 20 minutes per game, while averaging 8.3 points per game.

Beth Kuzmeski and Crystal Carroll were two keys to UMass' last victory over Xavier. Carroll has a current average of 12.2 ppg and 5.5 rpg. Kuzmeski, who has only missed two free throws this year, has shot .909 from the line.

Senior Melissa Gurile, the only Minutewoman to start every game this season, is averaging 14.9 points and 6.5 rebounds on the season.

The Lady Dukes (12-9, 7-4 A-10) are led by sophomore sensation Korie Hlede. Hlede currently leads the team in field goals, free throw percentage, rebounding, assists and points. Recording averages of 22.6 points and 7.2 rebounds per game, and a .900 percentage from the charity stripe, Hlede will be the biggest problem the Minutewomen have to contend with.

Alongside Hlede, Trixie Wolf has posted averages of 13.8 ppg and 5.6 rpg.

Duquesne leads the all-time series with the Minutewomen, holding a 16-10 advantage. However, the UMass squad has won the last two meetings between the teams.

In the last meeting Carroll shot 8-for-8 from the field, scoring 20 points, to lead UMass to a 54-51 victory.

In that game, the Minutewomen shot .667 from the floor in the second half to come back from an 11-point halftime deficit. The UMass defense held Hlede to a horrendous 4-21 shooting performance for a season-low 12 points.

The Minutewomen are coming off of a 75-56 win over the Xavier Musketeers, a game in which Thomas scored 25 points to power UMass.

Temple's Chaney impacts on more than basketball

Matt Vautour

In late November, following a hockey game between Massachusetts and Air Force, a reporter from Colorado Springs walked into the press conference room.

"Is this the Chaney room?" he asked, almost excitedly.

The UMass writers chuckled to themselves. They had heard it all before, from coaches and players alike. The room was indeed the very same place that Temple coach John Chaney unleashed his threats and tirade toward Massachusetts coach John Calipari, and for many years that is how it will be remembered.

Unfortunately though, that is also the way most people in the Pioneer Valley remember Chaney, the raving figure with the crazed look in his eyes threatening to kill Calipari. While the incident is not entirely unlike Chaney, a man of immense passion and emotion, there is more to the man than what transpired in that memorable press conference.

The Owls met St. Joseph's on Jan. 8, the night Dayton center Chris Daniels died. While most schools gave Daniels a tribute, a prepared statement read by the public address announcer, Temple did not. Prior to the start of the game, Chaney took the microphone himself and spoke from the heart about Daniels' memory.

That too is typical Chaney. Typical because John Chaney cares about his players, and while Daniels wasn't an Owl, Chaney realized what the loss of a player means.

Chaney, too, was once a player — a tremendous one as a matter of fact. Named the 1951 Public League Player of the Year in Philadelphia, he was perhaps NBA caliber. But Chaney is black, and in the early 1950s there just weren't black players entering college basketball. So rather than landing in his backyard in the Big 5, one of the nation's best players instead went to Bethune-Cookman. He eventually played in the Eastern Basketball League, for almost peanuts, knowing that he could be in the NBA if times were different.

Even his coaching started far down the ladder. At 64, Chaney has been through quite a bit. It's hard to believe that his coaching career started at Sayre Junior High and then Simon Gratz High School, where he was also a teacher. His teaching was just as impressive as his coaching. In fact he was chosen to receive the Pennsylvania Distinguished Faculty Award.

The players that Chaney brings in, for the most part, mirror his own background — players from tough neighborhoods, players with no fathers, players who have never had any kind of discipline.

Minutewomen break records end, as the Minutewomen traveled to Boston University to compete in the St. Valentine's Day Invitational.

Senior Nicole Roberts set the stage for the UMass squad, as she ran to a pair of personal records and a school record. With an ECAC qualifying time of 57.09 seconds, Roberts won the 400-meter-dash. The time is the fourth fastest in school history.

She also claimed a sixth place finish in the 200 with a 25.23. An ECAC qualifier, that time is also a new UMass record. Roberts eclipsed the old mark of 25.32, which was set by Lee Ann Ambrose in 1990.

Rosey Bryan also broke the old standard in the 200 with a seventh place time of 25.31. The sophomore also took sixth in the 55-meter-dash with a 7.45.

Rebecca Donaghue highlighted UMass' qualifying efforts with an eighth place finish in the mile. Her time of 4:50.4 provisionally qualifies her for the NCAAs, as well as the ECACs, and puts her second on UMass' all-time list.

Senior Jen Waeger finished twelfth in the mile with a time of 4:58.63, and joined Donaghue as an ECAC qualifier for the event.

Anya Forrest tied the school record she set in the 55-meter-hurdles last week at the Syracuse Invitational with a wining time of 8.15 seconds.

Several Minutewomen turned in supporting performances on the day. Emma Gardiner took eleventh in the 55-meter-dash with a time of 7.64 seconds. She also ran a 28.07 to finish 36th in the 200.

Yves Amazan, Melanie Bell and Shelanda Irish all finished within .26 seconds of each other in the 200. Amazan clocked a 26.33. Bell posted a 26.37 and Irish had a 26.59.

Silifa Kenku and Michelle Cooper nearly crossed the line together in the 400, as only .01 seconds separated them. Kenku finished with a time of 1:00.09 and Cooper crossed in 1:00.10.

Cheryl Lyons was the only UMass harrier in the 800, and she claimed sixteenth place in 2:24.63. In the 3,000 for women finished for Massachusetts Christy Martin and Katie Greenia took fifteenth and sixteenth, respectively. Martin clocked a 10:21.78 and Greenia notched a 10:24.33. Kristin Donaldson placed 20th in 10:31.70 and Melissa Langevin took 27th in 11:11.74.

In the field, Martin led the Minutewomen in the 20-pound weight throw with a mark of 47-3 inches. The throw placed her seventh. Stephanie Townson posted a throw of 46-10 to take eighth place. Shana Mitchell closed out the top 10 by taking tenth with a distance of 45-9 1/4.

Terriers win title in wild Beanpot

With the FleetCenter as the venue, the annual championship of Boston area college hockey was eventful as usual. Boston University took the title from Northeastern, scoring eight unanswered goals to take an 11-3 lead just 10:12 into the second period. BU cruised to an 11-4 win, scoring the most goals ever in a Beanpot championship game. The following are some observations from the night and some random Beanpot bits.

Leigh Torbin on College Hockey

- The Beanpot consolation game is seldom exciting. With the 5 p.m. start, many fans are fighting traffic or still at work, and the crowd lags. Even on the rare occasion that the Terriers play in this game it is sparsely attended. The apathy in the seats often carries over to the ice, and Monday's Boston College-Harvard consolation was no exception.

The consolation game, the only one of the four not televised, serves no real purpose. One press box TV was even tuned to "Baywatch," while the dull game progressed.

"That's a difficult game for both teams to play," BC coach Jerry York said. "It's probably going to be late in the second period before the 500th fan walks in, but it's still hockey. It's so different than some of the emotional games we play. The consolation game is a different type of atmosphere."

Yet, York is not in favor of dropping the game altogether stating that it does serve a definite

Men's and women's skiing successful over weekend

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Two All-America choices led the Massachusetts men's and women's ski teams this weekend in the Boston College Tournament at Mt. Ascutney, Vt.

Tom Schaefer and Leah Muliero led the way for their respective teams as the squads completed their most successful weekends to date.

Scoring a total of 472.90 points the Minutemen took top honors in the team slalom event. Plymouth State scored 475.04 points to finish second and host Boston College placed third (483.24 points).

The men claimed the top two spots in both the individual slalom and the individual giant slalom. Schaefer led UMass in the slalom with a two-run time of 89.79. Freshman Tom Fowler placed second behind Schaefer with a two-run time of 92.64.

Eric McCormack took eighth with a combined time of 94.37, while Thomas Holden (two-run time of 97.33) and Jim Cranston (98.77) rounded out the UMass scorers by taking 13th and 14th, respectively.

The Minutemen nearly swept the weekend tournament, taking second in the team giant slalom event with a tally of 474.94 points. BC won the giant slalom with 471.88 points, and Plymouth State took third (482.68).

Holden beat Schaefer to take the top spot in the individual giant slalom, clocking a two-run time of 91.53. Schaefer placed second with a 92.38. It was the first individual win of Holden's career.

Mike Lenarczyk finished ninth at 94.84, while Brian Foster (96.54) notched a 12th place finish and McCormack (96.65) was 13th.

On the women's side, the Minutewomen were powered to a second place finish in the team slalom behind the efforts of sophomore Muliero. UMass posted a team score of 308.86 points, with winner Boston College scoring 301.04, and third place Plymouth State 312.40.

With a two-run time of 99.13, Muliero finished fourth in the individual slalom. Freshman Katie Keane placed tenth with a two-run time of 102.52, and Heather Olsen closed out the Minutewomen scorers with a 14th place time of 107.21.

Massachusetts scored a 302.10 to place third in the team giant slalom, behind first place Smith College, which finished with 294.38 points. Plymouth State racked up 301.38 points to secure second place.

Muliero was again the star for UMass in the individual giant slalom, with a two-run time of 95.79 to place second. Keane figured into the scoring for the Minutewomen, taking tenth place with a combined time of 101.19. Olsen finished 20th at 105.12.

Schaefer and Muliero have been consistent early season leaders for Massachusetts. Schaefer has won three slalom titles in four meets, along with one giant slalom victory.

Muliero has placed in the top six in the giant slalom in all four meets this year, including two top-five performances.

Both of the UMass teams return to action Saturday in Charlemont, Mass., at the Smith College Tournament.

Solutions to Antonio's crowd problem discussed

JAMES REST/COLLEGIAN

Christine Lopes, president of the SGA, spoke out Tuesday night at the meeting of the Town Commercial Relations Committee at Bangs Community Center. The meeting was held to discuss the crowd problem at Antonio's.

Students, community members, town politicians, Amherst business owners and members of the police gathered together on Tuesday night to discuss the ongoing overcrowding problem at Antonio's Pizza-by-the-Slice.

Possible options for alleviating the safety hazard caused by the hungry crowds assembling late nights outside of the popular eatery were the main issues at hand. This was the second meeting the Town Commercial Relations Committee (TCRC) held for the public to offer suggestions, giving students returning from winter break the opportunity to add their input.

The main problem with the crowds, according to Town Manager Barry Del Castilho, is that because of the size of the crowd on the sidewalk, people are spilling out onto the street, causing potential danger for pedestrians and motorists.

"My greatest fear is for the people crossing the street," Del Castilho said, adding the possibility of large fights erupting because of the size of the crowd.

Amherst Police Captain Charles Sherpa explained that, although there were policemen outside of Antonio's late Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights, policemen were needed in other areas of Amherst Center, as well.

"We just can't handle it — the crowd has gotten bigger," said Sherpa, also emphasizing that, "We can solve any problem if you give us enough resources."

Nick Seaman, local business owner and committee member of the TCRC, stressed that reducing the crowds may not be the right solution to the problem. According to Seaman, crowds could be something positive, as long as safety needs are met.

"My attitude as a business owner is that crowds are good," he said. "I would like to see the Amherst community do more with UMass."

Seaman expressed enthusiasm for ideas such as a "pedestrian mall," which would section off one or more parts of North Pleasant Street, prohibiting vehicular traffic during certain late night periods. An advantage to the pedestrian mall, as outlined in a TCRC discussion paper of possible solutions, is that it could bring more people downtown and could include street musicians, vendors, street performances and various other attractions.

However, as also outlined in TCRC's discussion paper, many complications also exist in creating a pedestrian mall, such as the re-direction of traffic and still being able to secure unobstructed access to and from the Fire Station.

Students, faculty await Bulger

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

During his brief tenure as president of the University of Massachusetts system, William Bulger has not yet come to the Amherst campus in order to speak with the Student Government Association (SGA), Faculty Senate or the Rules Committee of the Faculty Senate.

At the faculty Senate meeting last Thursday Chancellor David K. Scott said that upon invitation, Bulger came to visit the University during the winter interim in order to speak with a group of faculty members who were to inform him of the work which they performed.

Yet because of bad weather Bulger was the only person who attended the meeting.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass President William Bulger

Since then, Bulger has visited the school several times. He has eaten lunch with local legislators and attended men's basketball games, but still not spoken to students or faculty members formally.

"I understand Bulger's hesitancy. He is building up to come and speak with [the Faculty Senate]," said Secretary of the Faculty Senate John Bracey. "He is still warming up a bit and he will be coming sometime in the spring."

Yet it remains unsure of when he will come to visit with students.

The Student Trustee Daniel Rivera stated that the SGA has invited him to speak at a meeting, and that although Bulger committed to coming, no definite date has been sent.

"I am sure that he will come as soon as he gets his feet on the ground," Rivera said.

Rivera has also invited Bulger to speak at the New Africa House. He has neither received an answer nor called Bulger in order to follow up on the invitation.

During the fall semester the SGA debated a motion which invited and welcomed Bulger to the school. The motion was changed such that it only "invited" Bulger to the school. Many senators did not feel that Bulger should be welcomed to the school until he came and informed them about himself and his plans for the University.

"The fact that Bulger has not come to school symbolizes the lack of communication between the stratified levels of most state schools," said senior political science major Jerimiah Hayward. "He sets a poor example which carries through to the rest of the administration. I do not expect the situation to change any time soon."

"Bulger is being very selfish," he said. "He should be involved with student activities. I would like to know about his budget plans."

Several students were uninformed about Bulger and declined to comment about his inaccessibility, but others questioned why the president has decided to keep his office in Boston. Rivera offered his response on the issue.

"Because he is the president of all the UMass campuses, it would show favoritism to have an office here," he said. "In Boston he has access to the State House which is very important for his position as president."

"Although Bulger's office is in Boston, he should find a way to be more accessible to students," junior Maurice Caston said. "After all, we are paying the bills and deserve to be heard and informed."

Sophomore Matthew McAulley offers a different perspective about the situation.

"It is probably a good thing that students do not have access to Bulger," he said. "I honestly believe that most students have nothing intelligent to say. If they did speak to Bulger, they would most likely be cry babies."

Presently, Scott is setting up a meeting between Bulger and the Rules Committee. Bulger will be coming sometime in the spring semester to speak to the SGA and Faculty Senate.

"We must respect [Bulger's] caution and give him some time," Scott said. "He is adjusting to a new situation."

SGA pressure Scott to 'free the fees'

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

Increasing pressure on Chancellor David K. Scott to address concerns over the allocation of student activities fees, the Student Government Association (SGA) Senate unanimously passed a motion Wednesday night requiring him to resolve the issue by Feb. 26. The move was in response to a meeting held Tuesday night by SGA officials for all Registered Student Organizations, (RSOs) to protest University policy regarding the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF).

The SATF is a student controlled trust, the only of its kind, financed through student activities fees, totalling $1.7 million. Its intended use is for RSOs and student business.

However, out of that total, $450,000 is either taxed by the University or mandated to be spent on services such as the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA).

At the meeting Tuesday night, attended by approximately 70 people representing over 25 student groups, SGA began organizing a campus-wide coalition to "free our fees."

"We need to mobilize and get our money back," said SGA Secretary of Finance Sean Carter.

A meeting has been scheduled to discuss the conflict with Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson, Friday at 1 p.m. in the Student Union Building Duke Room.

Michael Hass, the Student Coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) said that all students are encouraged to attend.

"We have the power of the numbers," Hass said.

The SGA plans to present Robinson, who will then advise the Chancellor, their proposal to remove the financial restrictions imposed upon the SATF by the University.

According to Carter and Hass, if the $450,000 was returned to the SGA, the resources would be available to raise each RSO budget by 400 percent.

SGA President Christine Lopes said that securing these additional funds will "make a investment into the quality of life on campus."

The meeting with Robinson will, in addition, provide RSOs with a forum to outline what additional SATF funds would do for their organization and the campus at large, to the Administration.

Jay Kleinola, a representative of University Productions and Concerts, said that these added funds would enable his organization to attract groups such as Pearl Jam and the Allman Brothers Band to campus for the annual spring concert.

As of Friday, the Chancellor will have ten days to sign onto the letter currently being presented to all concerned RSOs by the SGA, supporting total student control of the SATF.

"This is something the Chancellor will have to respond to. And if he doesn't, which he will, he will look like a fool," Hass said. "He will feel the pressure.

"A buzz needs to be created [about SATF reform] to the level of intensity as the buzz around the basketball team," SGA Student Trustee Dan Rivera concluded.

UM, Mexico develop telescope

Project may strengthen ties between bordering countries

By Anastasia Kudrez
Collegian Staff

For the sharpest focus on molecules at the edge of the observable universe, the Large Millimeter Telescope needs a clear, dry day.

The University of Massachusetts and the Instituto Nacional de Astrofisica, Optica y Electronica (INAOE) in Mexico are building the largest millimeter telescope in the world. The effectiveness of the telescope depends on finding a site with low humidity and clear weather patterns, typical of conditions at high altitudes.

To determine the best location for the Long Millimeter Telescope (LMT), a special radiometer was needed, so a team of UMass professors and graduate students, the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory, INAOE and the National University of Mexico (UNAM) designed and built it.

The team needed a radiometer that could pick up millimeter wavelengths. Paul Goldsmith, Michael Skrutskie, David Hiriart, Ronna Erickson and others from UMass and the FCRAO worked on the first two radiometers. In 1994, members of UNAM came to UMass to help build four more.

David Hiriart, who will receive a doctorate in astronomy from UMass this May, helped create the prototype radiometer. It is now monitoring possible sites for the $49 million LMT.

"The prototype took three or four months, because I was working on my Ph.D. during the week and building the instrument on the weekends," he said.

Each radiometer costs about $15,000. Its dimensions are two feet by one and a half feet. The instrument measures the amount of water in the atmosphere and the temperature.

The radiometer is powered by a device designed by FCRAO Research Engineer Ronna Erickson. Using solar panels and a car battery for energy, the radiometer reads data stored in an on-site lap-top computer. Each site must be visited every two weeks to download the information from the lap-top. The selected sites are on mountain peaks in Mexico.

"Every two weeks someone has to hike or take a burro up 14,000 feet to get the disk," Erickson said.

This data is sent back to the University for analysis via the Internet. Using a Data Acquisition Program, LMT staff member Doug McGonagle and Hiriart analyze the information from the six mountain peaks. Each peak will be monitored for a year by the radiometers to determine the most appropriate site for the LMT.

Some possible sites are San Pedro Martir in Baja California, Pinos in Zacatecas and Sierra Negra in Veracruz.

Erickson continually stressed the binational and collaborative nature of the project. One purpose of the LMT project is to strengthen the relationship between U.S. and Mexican scientific communities.

"It's no one's full-time job. It's a collaboration of the FCRAO labs and the UNAM labs; combinations of groups of people," she said.

Hiriart has a dual vision for the LMT — scientific advancement and the promotion of astronomy in Mexico.

"Science is not attractive in Mexico," he said. "Engineers have easier courses, better salaries and more jobs."

Hiriart hopes the LMT will encourage more Mexican people to pursue scientific careers. When asked if he will pursue research on the LMT, he was uncertain.

"It is difficult to say who will be there," he said. "Once it is established, I will decide if I want to be involved.

2. Each radiometer costs about $15,000.
3. Radiometers have been placed on six mountain peaks in Mexico.
4. The data from radiometers is stored by on-site lap-top computers. Every two weeks, someone hikes up 14,000 feet to the site to download the data.
5. The radiometer data is sent to UMass via the Internet for analysis.
6. The site for the LMT should be selected within two years.

Racism alleged in Sharpe case

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — In an atmosphere charged by an accusation of racial stereotyping, a jury opened deliberations Wednesday on the case of a black AIDS patient who says he contracted the virus at a dental office.

The 14-member, all-white jury was reviewing testimony from the non-criminal trial that began in Hampshire Superior Court on Feb. 5. The jury deliberated for five hours without coming to a verdict.

It was set to resume deliberations Thursday.

The dentist's lawyer, Edward Donnellan, closed the defense case by saying it is unclear how James Sharpe got sick. Donnellan said it cannot be proven that Sharpe was infected at his dentist's office.

"There's no smoking gun that allows you to say that's why he got the virus," the lawyer said.

Donnellan, who represents Springfield dentist Anthony E. Broglio, brought forward a surprise witness this week who testified that she had a sexual affair with Sharpe. Her testimony was meant to suggest other ways Sharpe could have been infected with the HIV virus that causes AIDS.

Survey to address GLBT concerns of UMass campus

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

The division of Student Affairs and the Office of Human Relations is conducting a survey that looks at the concerns of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender students on the University of Massachusetts campus.

The survey studies issues such as harassment and discrimination that GLBT students may encounter. Sandra Herbst, a graduate student in higher education administration, is compiling data which looks at both the positive and negative issues for the GLBT community.

She is hoping to use the results in her thesis, but plans to make the information available to organizations which assist GLBT students.

"I want to make sure the results are given to people who will care and do something with the data," Herbst said.

The survey is open to all GLBT undergraduates on the UMass campus only. It will not be made available to any graduate students or students from the other five colleges.

"We are going to try to not compare with other schools," Herbst said. "I want to look at just UMass and what we are offering to our students."

The questions range from the safeness on campus to personal attacks or harassment. It also deals with such questions as "Would you recommend UMass to other GLBT students?" and the availability and helpfulness of GLBT resources that UMass offers.

The survey has the full support of the Stonewall Center. It is also being co-sponsored by the Student Affairs Research Office (SARIS). It was initiated by Gary Malaney, director of SARIS and Grant Ingle, director of the Office of Human Relations. Malaney and Herbst then developed the questions for the survey.

Herbst stressed that the survey is completely anonymous, and thus will not be mailed out. They are currently being distributed at Stonewall Center events during the month of February and at other GLBT related events.

"Because we are not mailing it out we are depending on students to get the word out and pass it along to friends," Herbst said.

Students can also pick it up at three places on campus: The Stonewall Center, SARIS and the Office of Human Relations. There is no due date for the return of the survey, but Herbst asks that it be returned as soon as possible. She hopes to have a basic set of data by the beginning of April.

"We hope to get as many surveys returned as possible," Herbst said.

Massachusetts Commuter Area Government, expressed his concern for the disruptions caused by the re-direction of traffic.

"I've spoken with many UMass students and they seemed really happy with the idea of the pedestrian mall, but we should be looking at the problems that are going to occur from traffic being re-directed," he said.

Widening the sidewalks, adjusting bus schedules, increasing the severity of law enforcement, and adjusting traffic light timing were listed among the many options at the meeting.

Hill Boss, a member of the Town Select Board, raised the question of university involvement.

"To what degree does the university have a responsibility created by their students when they leave that campus for the off-campus behavior of their students?" he asked.

Robert Brooks, chairman of the TCRC, was quick to remind Boss that students assembling outside of Antonio's were not entirely from UMass, and there were two other colleges in the area.

Christine Lopes, president of the Student Government Association, said she came to make sure that UMass was not misrepresented in the problem and suggested experimenting with all of the possible solutions discussed.

The TCRC will turn their suggestions over to the Town Select Board to be voted on at a later date.

Sacred text translation finally available for Russian Jews

MOSCOW (AP) — The Babylonian Talmud, second in importance only to the Old Testament in Jewish tradition, is coming out in Russian for the first time.

Since the time of the Czars, copies of the Talmud have been scarce in Russia — and it has never been translated. During Soviet times, it was banned, and anti-Semites took quotes out of context to portray Jews as greedy and spoiling for world domination.

Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, an Israeli known for translating the Talmud into modern Hebrew, released the first Russian volume of the Talmud in Moscow on Tuesday.

"Now Russia can read one of the oldest religious books written by Jews," said Arkady Kovelman, the head of the Jewish University in Moscow.

The Talmud, the cornerstone of Jewish tradition, is a collection of religious and civil laws and their interpretations by Jewish sages. Some of its 63 sections, known as tractates and dealing with everything from ritual to marriage laws and commercial debates, date back 1,700 years.

The bulk of it is written in old Hebrew and ancient Aramaic.

Steinsaltz popularized the Talmud by translating and interpreting it to make the writings more accessible to secular Israelis, and his institute in Jerusalem went on to launch the English and French versions.

During the officially atheist Soviet era, when Communist authorities suppressed most religious activities and studies, the only editions of the Talmud available in Russia were leftovers in the few functioning synagogues or smuggled in by foreign travelers.

Mikhail Gorbachev's reforms and the 1991 Soviet collapse prompted not only a large Jewish emigration, but also a Jewish religious and cultural revival inside the country that including the free movement of religious books and artifacts across the borders.

Still, Russian Jews could not read the Talmud in their native language.

"This Talmud edition is significant because it is the first ... ever published in Russian," Kovelman said in an interview Wednesday. "It will help many Russians and Russian Jews understand the Talmud."

The edition released Tuesday was the first volume. The most popular section of the work, it deals with commercial law. Each of the 5,000 copies printed in the first run sells for the equivalent of $8.50.

Mt. Holyoke cadet earns celebrated award

Yesterday, on a cold Amherst afternoon, Sarah LeGates, a senior biology major from Mt. Holyoke College received the Legion of Valor Bronze Cross from the University of Massachusetts Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC).

The award presentation, which took place in Boyden Building, was attended by many officers of the ROTC, all of whom were dressed in uniform.

Receiving the Legion of Valor Bronze Cross is considered to be a very high honor, and is given only to three students throughout the entire East coast each year.

"It is an honor to receive this award, but I tend not to get over whelmed by anything. I am taking this in stride," LeGates said.

The competition for the Legion of Valor Bronze Cross is tough. The medal is awarded for both outstanding achievement in academics and exemplary performance in the Reserve Officer Training Corps.

LeGates is currently ranked as a Cadet Captain. After she graduates this year, she plans to work for the Army Core of Engineers, but not for ever.

"My future is really pretty much open," she said.

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Do you believe government officials, both executive and legislative, should be permitted to go on fact-finding trips paid for by private interests?

Bill Clinton

"Yes, as long as the travel is consistent with all regulations preventing conflict of interest, and so long as full disclosure is made of the costs of travel, all members of the traveling party and, how the trip is paid for."

Bob Dole

"Last year, the Senate passed new ethics rules that allow privately financed fact-finding trips only to the extent these trips are related to the performance of a senator's official duties and are publicly disclosed. Under the new rules, senators may not accept reimbursement from private sources for participating in events that are essentially recreational in nature."

Lamar Alexander

"No."

Richard Lugar

"Some such trips may be useful in gaining information, but many others may pose conflicts of interest. The most effective deterrent against undesirable trips is requiring full disclosure of the monetary, purposes, funding source, and activities of such trips. New Senate gift rules, which I supported, prohibit lobbyists from paying for travel expenses for a senator to meetings, speeches, fact-finding trips, or similar events."

Pat Buchanan

"No. There should be a ban on free travel for federal officials paid for by corporations and private interests."

1996 REQUEST FOR PROPOSALS

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations is soliciting innovative proposals for educational activities and programs which have the following goals:

- promote mutual respect
- enhance understanding of social justice and multicultural issues
- encourage collaboration between different campus communities and constituencies

Eligibility: Undergraduates, graduate students, staff and faculty, as individuals or groups

Award Criteria: Proposed activities

- must bring together persons from two or more communities or constituencies in a joint activity
- must demonstrate collaboration of communities or constituencies in the proposal planning process
- must promote mutual respect and understanding on the campus or larger community
- should represent new programs or collaborating partnerships as opposed to annual programs or continuations of past projects
- should be completed by the end of the fall 1996 semester

Examples of Activities Which Could be Funded: Forums, speakers, film/video series, seminars, workshops, public education programs about hate crimes and incidents, outreach activities to secondary schools and home communities, community public service programs, faculty/student collaboration to develop new courses, performance events, printed materials, posters.

Proposal Components:

- a clear description of how the proposed activities will meet both the goals and award criteria
- a list of groups involved and the person or persons responsible for the activity
- a mechanism for evaluating impact and effectiveness of the activities
- a timeline indicating when the activities would start and conclude
- a budget

Award Ranges: $250 to $1500, with total of all awards not to exceed $10,000

Becoming clothes–er

People remind me of articles of clothing sometimes. Every now and then you'll meet a person you can depend on like your favorite pair of jeans. Other times of course, you'll run into people that remind you of that pair of jeans you always try to squeeze into but can never quite enjoy. Roommates fall into this category quite nicely — they either fit or they don't. I'm not saying it turns out this way automatically. You may actually have to shed a couple pounds or preconceived notions before you make some bond happen, but I wouldn't toss them to the Salvation Army right away.

I went through a couple of denim disasters in my day, but fortunately living with the roommate I've had for the past four years doesn't feel like holding my breath in to zip up. I am not an easy person to live with either. Amazingly though I have never found myself locked out of my room (excluding the times I can credit my own stupidity for that), and I have never found my clothes strewn on the front lawn. My roommate and I actually get along — not that this seemed to be a likely assumption from the beginning.

Tara Ruelle

Joanne walked into the box they tried to pass off as a room that first day with her motorcycle helmet and one egg crate holding all of her stuff.

"Oh you must be my new roommate, my third actually. You took my bed," she said hastily. The initial meeting didn't look too promising, didn't look like we'd have too much in common. I had moved my entire life into that small space — she forgot her brush. The button on my jeans started to feel a little snug.

As I stood before the person to whom I was supposed to sleep in very close proximity, I was not convinced of this blossoming friendship. "You have a lot of stuff, let me just move some things around," she muttered. Polar opposites, I thought. She rearranged the room five minutes after arrival. My mother called that first week to check up on the living arrangements. "She's weird, mom. I think she's a hippie or something." I whined. A hippie, fortunately, she was not. She was studying to be an Animal Science major however. Anything that involves hay makes my eyes water.

Two dorm rooms, and two apartments later, at least the roommate has been a constant. It's shocking to me that when one of us leaves for a whole day we interrupt each other every five minutes to get a word in. Our obvious differences are complimentary. Math scares me — she's like Rain Man when figuring out the phone bill.

I have endured numerous horror stories over the past weeks regarding my friend's roommates and the less-than-perfect relations they share. I can't imagine not being able to go back to my apartment to avoid annoyances. Then again, I can't imagine not coming home and smelling barn but not being fazed by it. I was lucky, no typical horror stories.

I'm starting to feel the sappiness seeping in, but I must add that I can't imagine not bunking with Joanne after the next three months. People ask me all the time why I didn't get a two room apartment so I could have my own room. Surprised, I say "Why would I do that?" I'll actually miss the barn clothes and the random research animals she brings home to nurse. After all this time, the differences are still there but they still compliment each other, and we manage to sneak our influences on each other here and there. The motorcycle helmet and my stuff's still around, thrown all over our floor. She has three brushes now and I'm much more apt to know about the gestation period of a pig than I would be before.

I have plenty of room in the waist now.

Language barrier

"He just called you a moron," the Israeli woman on my left said to me in response to something my friend on my other side said in Hebrew, unintelligible to me.

It was the middle of August of 1995. I had been in Israel for slightly more than two weeks. My friend on my right and I were in a cab on our way to go hiking for the weekend in the Golan Heights in northern Israel.

In the current political situation, the ruling administration in Israel is willing to trade parts of the Golan in exchange for peace. How much longer this terrain will be considered Israel is a subject matter which will not be expounded within this apolitical column.

I had just finished trying to explain to her, in very broken Hebrew, that I know how to read and write the language, but not to speak it. My friend, who was raised by his Israeli family in Montreal, speaks fluent Hebrew and he seized the opportunity to put me in my place by humbling me.

Henry J. Brier

After having studied abroad last semester, and having also visited some other foreign countries while subject to more humiliating experiences, one of the most valuable lessons that I have learned is how important knowledge of more than one language is.

The world in which we currently inhabit is immense, providing for an endless amount of places to visit. Chances are that the more languages one knows, the more likely it is that the tourist will make the most of their opportunity abroad.

During my semester on exchange, I was fortunate to have seen four countries, including Israel, where I was based. Israelis start learning English in the fourth grade, and, in addition to speaking Hebrew, some grow up speaking Arabic, the language of the Middle East. This could already provide for the ability to be tri-lingual.

Opportunity to get ahead in the international or domestic job market is far greater for someone who speaks three languages, as compared to someone who only speaks one language. Also, the multilingual individual is better positioned for upward mobility.

While traveling, the ability to speak the respective country's mother tongue enables the individual to communicate with the natives, who are not as prepared to accommodate the tourist.

While in the Aegean Sea, I hopped around a few scenic Greek islands, where the economy is dependent upon tourism. If I were able to speak Greek, I probably would not have been treated like a walking dollar sign in Santorini and Mykonos.

The ability to speak a foreign language also has the potential to greatly enhance the individual's intellect, as local newspapers and other publications can be understood.

Had I spoken Turkish, my travels through western Kusadasi, Cappadocia and Istanbul would have been more fulfilling, as I could have found out what was happening in Turkey through the language commonly spoken in the region I visited.

The ability to speak different languages also provides for the opportunity to interact with that many more people, as the history and more pronounced aspects of a foreign land can be highlighted.

If I understood Arabic, my visit to Jordan would have been more enhanced than it was. My Jeep tour of the desert at Wadi Rum and my stint through the ancient trading village of Petra would have been more culturally enriching. The more people with whom one speaks in a foreign land, the more realistic the experience will be.

The disadvantages of knowing foreign languages are nonexistent. If anyone happens to know of any reasons why it is detrimental to know foreign languages, please let them be known.

Yet there are difficulties within the process of learning foreign languages. They are difficult to pick up, especially for those of us who are impatient or anxious with such subjects.

The best way to learn a language, in my opinion, is to put oneself in a position where application is a must in order to survive. That way, the effort will directly benefit, as the individual will not be naturally thinking about how to conjugate verbs so they make sense.

The individual is also required to be stubborn, and not bend to the pressure of reverting to a language in which they have a firm command.

Some of my most memorable experiences in Israel were the semi-heated arguments in Hebrew with proprietors at the markets in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. I will also never forget the small-talk with cab drivers.

Often my offers and questions would be answered in English, but I would respond in Hebrew, as I would prefer to practice the language I would now like to learn in consummation.

My friend from Montreal, who speaks three languages, is unable to read or write Hebrew. His attempts to enhance these skills are faring very slowly which, needless to say, repeatedly gives me payback opportunity from that watered-hed cab ride last August.

Affirmative inaction

I am just as tired of hearing about that dreaded issue politicians call "affirmative action" as you are. I began last semester with a column on this issue expressing my discontent on the way it's being misinterpreted thus misused. I must further elaborate.

Let's just see how it's affected your education and mine. Here's a common result and reaction: I didn't get accepted into that school, but I know some minority (or female) who did and he/she was less qualified. In addition to that, he/she got some scholarship. They get all the money.

David Chan

I can sympathize and so can some minorities too. I didn't get into UNC Chapel Hill because 1) I am not a resident of North Carolina, which makes my admission standards even tougher than Harvard's and 2) Chapel Hill was in a process of boosting its African American population. They had no qualms with keeping their Asian population at 2%. But my qualifications were well above Chapel Hill's averages. I got over it. I have no resentments about their goals or policies.

None of my "qualified" Asian male friends were accepted to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology either. All of my "less qualified" female friends did though, and they're doing just fine there.

Is this what education is about? Getting into a certain university? Shouldn't an all around education include the experiences that college students relish from a diverse community? Like it or not, in 25 years the largest minorities are going to be European–Americans.

Whether it be making a new friend, taking foreign language courses, or even just hearing a perspective from a "different" someone, can anyone honestly say that their educational experience has not benefited from a diverse community? I know that I have. My high school, despite a 12% Asian population, only had a handful of Latinos and African–Americans. In my three years in college, I was finally able to get a decent grasp of Spanish thanks to native–speaking friends, learn a little Mandarin, hang out with people of all ethnicities, make friends with rich and poor, city and country folk and the list goes on. I never had these opportunities. Let's not forget that when you combine unity and diversity you get a university.

Also, do numbers really tell the whole story? Take our own university for example. The average SAT score here at UMass is not high compared to schools that we want to be categorized with. Can anyone here with a score below the university's average, which is approximately 1000, admit that he/she does not belong here? Or better yet, is that score a true quantifier of your "intelligence" or "potential to succeed?" If there's any number that tells the story, it's the correlation between income levels and SAT scores. According to The College Board's 1994 statistics, SAT scores in both the verbal and math sections increased with family income. Students with families earning less than $10,000 scored on average 76b and students with $70,000+ scored on average 1000. It seems like the SATs are more of reflection of class than individuality.

So what is the cause of this? I'm wondering why this isn't the issue instead. The impediment of poor schooling, impoverished family life and ignored harsh neighborhoods are obstacles to a young student. If a student from such a background were to achieve the same score as another student who has been brought up in a rich household that can afford all those Kaplan and Princeton Review courses and has been educated in violence–free prestigious schools, would not the score of the disadvantaged student hold more weight? Even a slightly lower score could hold more meaning. This scenario doesn't even involve race. It's about disadvantaged backgrounds.

Affirmative action should not be about revenge on the white elite although during its early stages that's what it seemed to be. One Federal regulation wanted affirmative action to overcome the effects of prior discrimination. Those days should be gone because such an approach would only increase tension. I didn't know that our justice system warranted the "eye for an eye" approach. Many of the white males that have long relished from unwritten preferences as fraternity brothers, country club members and children of alumni are the same ones that are against race–based affirmative action although it's doing exactly what they've been doing. Nobody likes an eye for an eye.

Here's the final say. Affirmative action should solely be used to make decisions based on individual attributes that go further than just race. It would take into consideration the disadvantaged upbringing and the affects of class on placement tests. It would see the difference of the same numbers. Meaningful attributes such as potential and perseverance can now be measured. Past achievements and race will no longer be the sole separating factors between students. But until there is a class–based, early education affirmative action, there will always be the disadvantaged who are ignored and don't receive a fair share of quality education and training needed to apply to colleges and compete in the workforce.

Unfortunately there are those out there who are aggressively seeking to abolish affirmative action. Politicians, mostly conservatives, do not see the value and educational benefits of a diverse community within an institution. They don't see where the disadvantaged are coming from. Most importantly, they don't see that the disadvantaged can't get out unless given a chance — a chance for a quality education. And as long as they remain poor, so will their SAT scores. I guess these politicians are highly educated and alumni of prestigious schools. Seems to me they haven't learned a darn thing.

Letters to the Editor

In Jones' defense

To the editor:

M.F. (Mighty Fine) Jones' antics are tricks to play off the politics of deviousness so rampant. Yes, he is the class clown. Jokesters, tricksters, jesters and clowns parlay parody into a fine art, all are edified and entertained as a result.

Some go off to sulk, generally humorless uptight types. But remember, the real clowns are in the Beltway (buckle up).

Martin invites us to laugh at ourselves, points out new truths along the way and a few tricks to keep thinking folks on their toes. He may [attack] the Right, he may [attack] the Left, but he's forging ahead in choppy waters. Abby Hoffman would understand. There's real power in his motley bag of tricks. Sure gets us to sit up and take notice. At least he's not sitting around allowing the forces of history to inundate him.

He gets us to think, to question our sacred cows which can only be good for all. However, that thought process is initially painful but change producing. In that way he is a breath of fresh air as he goes a–skewering, charging at wind mills. And there are a lot of wind mills to charge at these days. This one person revolution can be upsetting to the status quo who have the most to lose. Naturally they'd go apoplectic over his diverting antics and high jinks.

Basically he's harmless and well intended. So why not leave him alone to swim against the stream? See the message. Don't attack the messenger. Maybe he's right about a few things. As he points the way to a better world, taking other's blows [so] that the rest of us may have it easier.

It has always been that way with social change agents, a lesson I know only too well.

Many Martin Joneses have come and gone on this campus. Can we lighten up, chill out and enjoy the free show?

Weekend Edition • Volume CV Issue 81

Sweeping away the trash

If you haven't guessed yet, it's February sweeps. That explains how Elizabeth Taylor managed to finagle a two hour advertisement on CBS's Monday night line–up.

The actress (who is in the process of divorcing husband number seven, Larry Fortensky) made appearances on "Can't Hurry Love," "Murphy Brown" and "High Society." On her jaunt through the sitcoms, she managed to lose some valuable jewels, find them and then have them stolen again. Along the way, you can be sure that she made plenty references to her "White Linen" perfume line.

"Friends" continued the special guests trend this week when Tom Selleck played an old dentist friend of Monica's (Courtney Cox). Rachel (Jennifer Aniston) and Ross (David Schwimmer) got serious... finally. Of course, it remains to be seen if the high ratings continue, now that Rachel and Ross actually did it. Between the Diet Coke and milk commercials, the cast of "Friends" is becoming overexposed fast.

Speaking of overexposure, Aniston posed for the cover of Rolling Stone in the nude, following in the illustrious foot steps of Madonna and Demi Moore. Aniston also found herself a guest star on FOX's "Ned and Stacy."

Jane Curtain can't seem to stay away from aliens. The former Conehead has landed a part as frazzled office manager on the hideously bad show, "Third Rock From the Sun." The comedy (using the term loosely) is drenched with hormonally–charged aliens who have come to earth to learn more about the planet a la "Mork and Mindy." The jokes are old and the acting is bad. Curtain acts like she hasn't quite gotten over her "Kate & Allie" phase and the rest of the acting is out–of–this–world bad.

Snowboarding is fast becoming the #1 winter sport

Snowboarding has been hailed as one of the fastest growing winter sports ever. It's popularity has crossed from being just a younger person's sport to something even Regis Philbin is willing to have a go at.

Snowboarding Festival

Wachusett hosted a Snowboard Festival this past January sponsored by Ski Industries American in order to exclusively promote snowboarding. The SIA Slide & Ride Snowboard Festival caravan featured free learn–to–ride snowboard lessons, demonstration snowboards for test ride, snowboard boots for men and women and complimentary snowboard clothing to wear while riding.

According to SIA President, David Ingemie, the goal of the festival was simple. "The goal of Slide & Ride is very simple. We want people to try snowboarding and become snowboarders." Nearly 3,000 people participated in the season's fist two festivals last month in Colorado and according to a press release 40–percent of the participators said they would stay with the sport.

The SIA, Snowboard & Outdoor Sports Show is the world's largest collection of on snow products with nearly 900 companies filling the Las vegas Convention Center in the upcoming March show.

Snow boarding as a business

Snowboarding purchases have also gone up in the past decade. According to Fortune magazine, there were 2 million boarders last winter, one third more than in 1990. Many of these people are skiers who first scoffed at the sport. Morrow Snowboards, a company that specializes in making boards, have invited purchasers to also buy stock in the company to see for themselves how good an investment snowboarding has become.

Companies have also taken to tailoring their sales to women and hyping it up as a good sport for females. Boards are being made narrower and more flexible for women. Clothing is also being down sized and marketed for off the slope wearers as well.

Getting started

The average snowboard can cost a person up to $400 according to Dan Sheehan at the Fat Trax snowboarding shop in Easthampton.

"For a brand new board and bindings it will cost around $400. You need to look for a company with a warranty, that's your main goal," said Sheehan. "Also you want to make sure it's the right shape and size. You might have the right board but it doesn't do you a lot of good if it doesn't fit. It's just not going to work for you."

Sheen is a senior at Ludlow High School and is in his sixth season boarding.

"At first it was a little tricky. The first few days were hard and you really need the basics. But once you get those down you're fine," said Sheehan.

According to Sheehan the progression in snowboarding is a lot quicker than skiing.

"Within the last few years it's [snowboarding] really blown up. There's been a lot of public interest and a lot of corporations intereste2 too. It's a whole business unto itself," he said.

Boarders vs. skiers

In 1994, Newsweek did an article on the clash between boarders and skiers. Seen as a sport for "young people," snowboarding was regarded as a reckless sport with no real value. Boarders often looked out of control to skier who panic, but in fact according to Ski Patrol magazine, the ratio of collisions between boarders and skiers is equal to that of just skiers and skiers. Ali Zucaroli, a SIA representative said that slopes have become more user friendly can and accommodate both skiers and boarders without conflict.

Trails and snow tubes have also been set aside for boarders conveyance. Mt. Tom in nearby Holyoke, Mass has an area reserved for beginning boarders, but share most of the mountain with skiers.

"There is an area for beginners where we teach them. But once they reached the advanced level, they share the mountain with skiers," said Adi Scheidle, director of the ski school at Mt. Tom.

According to Scheidle, it only takes boarders two lessons before they are out on their own.

"It depends on the capability of the person and the snow conditions, but usually it only takes two lessons. It's quite fast," he said.

Scheidle also said that there hasn't been any real conflict between the two sports and that it's been very "harmonic."

To Board or Not to Board

Snowboarding isn't without risks. According to a study done in Australia, out of 276 injuries compiled over four years, 58–percent of injuries occurred amongst novices. Fifty–seven percent were in the lower limbs. The most common injuries were sprains, fractures, knee and ankle

People and Pop Culture in the News

Thank God that Valentine's Day is over so we can begin to focus on more pressing issues. Queen Latifah one of the stars of FOX's "Living Single" was arrested for alleged possession of marijuana and a loaded .38-caliber pistol after being pulled over for speeding.

Remember Milli Vanilli? Remember the lip-synching scandal? Well, just when you thought it couldn't get any worse, Rob Pilatus, one half of the less than dynamic duo, was caught trying to break into a car, fled from the police, broke into a house and verbally assaulted a resident. After being caught he was charged with making "terroristic threats."

Hair Solo would not be impressed. Actor Billy Dee Williams (Lando Calrissian) was arrested for domestic violence after allegedly battering his unidentified live-in girlfriend. He was fined on $5k, (AL pa).

Davy Jones of the Monkees recently won the Ontario Amateur Rider Handicap in Lingfield, England. The horse was a gift from his daughter and fulfilled Jones' long time dream of being in the winner's circle. It is a little known fact that as a child the singer trained briefly to be a jockey.

Gene Kelly, the man that danced his way into the hearts of millions with his smooth stepping and suave style, died at age 83 of natural causes. If it weren't for him we would never had been able to enjoy such classic films like Singin' in the Rain or Brigadoon. He will be missed, but never forgotten.

Tina Turner is making strides a Chevalier of Arts and Letters, France's highest arts honor. Turner will release a new album, What's Love Got to Do with It, which will be released on April Fool's Day.

Placido Domingo and the Met have both done Otello 203 times. The tenor sang the title role in Verdi's opera for the 203rd time at Saturday's performance by the Metropolitan Opera. It also happened to be the 203rd performance of Otello at the Met, which opened its doors in 1883.

"Baywatch" actress, Gena Lee Nolin is the new spokesperson for Sasson clothing replacing "Melrose Places" Daphne Zuniga. Is it a coincidence that "Baywatch" actresses Pamela Lee and Gena Lee are both busty and blonde? It's doubtful.

Film — Heidi Fleiss

Heidi Fleiss, Beverly Hills prostitute + daughter turned Hollywood madam = a breathtaking person. Admit it, you were intrigued when she was arrested and you remained intrigued after hearing her talk. I mean, this is a woman who said that she and her girls had enough power to control Congress — Congress!

Anyway, Sue Broomfield has created a documentary Heidi Fleiss: Hollywood Madam for In Pictures of the investigation surrounding Fleiss. In the unrated film we see how Fleiss went from a high school dropout to hooker and eventually madam. We meet her "mentor," Madam Alex and her alleged pimp a.ka. FBI informer Jean Nagy.

Gimmicks are axed (thumbs are dropped) and everything is left up to viewer's opinion. The climax of the movie is an interview with the Madam and a personal talk about who she is and how she really feels.

Video — Usual Suspects

The question "Who is Keyser Soze?" will be buzzing around office ruins this month, as The Usual Suspects hits the shelves.

Nominated for Best Screenplay in the upcoming Academy Awards, the cast stars Gabriel Byrne, Kevin Pollak, Stephen Baldwin and Benicio Del Toro as crooks who are assembled for a bogus police lineup which ends them back in trouble again. Also in the crew is Supporting Actor nominee Kevin Spacey, who reportedly plays Verbal Kint.

The five guys become ensnared in Soze's web of crime, forcing them into a caper that will leave them either rich or dead. Director Bryan Singer steers this mystery through its various plot twists and turns to a successful and climactic surprise ending.

The cleverly constructed and witty film with equal parts comedy and suspense thrown in the mix is worth, and almost requires, a second viewing.

Book — Zenzele

"If on the shore of many African books that could be the modern experience of post-independence African parents/girls from a women's perspective," says author Nuruddin Mahamed Farah's book Zenzele: A Letter For My Daughter, fills that gap.

Mahamed was born and raised in Zimbabwe. At 18, she left Zimbabwe to earn her undergraduate degree at Harvard University and received her M.D. from Columbia University. Now working on a residency in neurosurgery at Yale, Mahamed found solace from her busy life in writing Zenzele.

The book consists of stories told to her by her father. Some were political while others speak of the struggle for independence and traditional customs. Still others are about life, sorrow and love. Many of the stories in Zenzele have been passed down for generations which makes this collection special.

Pavement releases three track EP; Soraya's debut shines sweetly

PAVEMENT
Pacific Trim EP
Matador

Four years ago Pavement was the most hyped indie rock band since Nirvana, based on the overwhelming praise for their EPs Demolition Plot and Perfect Sound Forever, both released on Drag City. Their debut album, Slanted & Enchanted was flawless.

As a follow-up teaser they released the near-perfect Watery Domestic, containing four incredible songs clocking in at a total of less than 11 minutes. It was clear that Pavement knew the power of an EP. Unfortunately after multiple appearances on MTV and a summer of touring with the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, the band has forgotten the magical formula.

Pacific Trim is a brief (very brief) collection of three new songs none of which match Pavement's past success. "Give It A Day" and "Gangsters & Pranksters" both could pass as Crooked Rain Crooked Rain out-takes, while "Saganaw" should have been left at home.

Is this a teaser for what is to come? Let's hope not — maybe the band managed to get off track on their road to indie rock utopia. Sure they may still be many a fan's favorite nerdy band but now they have a 7:44 blemish on their driving record. Well, even the Beatles released "Free As A Bird."

Supposedly this EP is limited edition — and with good reason. It does not deserve to stand next to past EPs such as Perfect Sound Forever. They should have dubbed this one Perfect Sound For Never. C- (Mike Burke)

MR T EXPERIENCE
Love Is Dead
Lookout Records

They're on Lookout and they sound like Green Day, so don't expect anything radically original with this album.

The Mr. T Experience do deserve credit for longevity — they've been playing this kind of music since 1985, long before it was considered cool, and they haven't changed in ten years either. This pop punk will inspire you to pogo around the room and that is about it. In fact this band seems to be more influenced by the Beatles then the Sex Pistols.

Yet there is something about this album that will keep it playing on your stereo. First of all, it is one of the catchiest albums of the year. "Ba Ba Ba Ba Ba," the album's second track, will be in your head all day. "Sackcloth and Ashes," "I Just Wanna Do It With You" and "Dumb Little Band" will keep a smile on your face while you contemplate all the failed romances in your life. The songs "The Future Ain't What It Used To Be" and "Thank You (For Not Being One Of Them)" show surprisingly intelligent lyrics for such a normally silly band. However pop songs about girls and alienation have become trite and after the third track all the songs seem to sound the same.

As a punk album Love Is Dead falls short. However as a pop album it's pretty good. B (Adam Dlugacz)

SORAYA
On Nights Like This Island

Soraya releases a new album. COURTESY DOROTHY LOWE

Pavement COURTESY GAIL BUTTENWAY

Listening to Soraya's debut album On Nights Like This one could easily think they were actually hearing Sarah McLachlan's album Fumbling Towards Ecstasy, with all of her breathy and enchanting vocals.

A Miami native of Colombian ethnicity, Soraya incorporates cultural and musical influences into her songs on the album. It is evident after listening to her vocals that her style was molded from the influences of singer/songwriters Joni Mitchell and Rickie Lee Jones.

Her career jump started in England, though, where she recorded the album at the Red House Studio in the countryside and at the infamous Abbey Road Studio in London.

There are songs which reflect the love for her husband, such as the first track, "Suddenly," and the enchantingly haunting "Ruins in My Mind," which tells the tale of a failed relationship (earthquake ruins in Guatemala inspired the lyrics and song title).

Besides the usual themes — love, hate and loss — Soraya includes a piece which reflects her Colombian heritage, "Pueblito Viejo," a song her uncle used to sing to her as a child.

A Spanish version of On Nights Like This is also available on Island Records.

Despite the similarities to McLachlan, Soraya has made a grand attempt with her debut album. Her songs evoke different emotions, so whether you are in a romantic mood or a depressed one, this album will surely work for you. B (Lorraine Urbanski)

PANSY DIVISION
With I'd Been Taking Pictures
Lookout Records

There is a distinct difference between pop and punk. Pop is happy, hummable, light music while punk is loud, fast and aggressive. Bands like Green Day have blurred the distinction. Green Day however do not present a threat and have been plastered all over mainstream radio and MTV.

While Pansy Division play in the same musical vein as Green Day they simply will never reach the same exposure. Why? Because Pansy Division are a very threatening band who sing about relationships, sexual politics and solitude all from a homosexual perspective. They are a threatening band because they don't hide their sexuality but rather flaunt it in a way that would make even Madonna cringe.

Songs like "Dick of Death" and "Morning Woody" are two songs that Bob Dole would find simply unacceptable. However both songs are just as catchy and fun as anything Green Day would write. Through their honesty and humor Pansy Division knock down any walls a homophobic society could put in front of them. Furthermore they play with a bite and ambition that Green Day will never achieve.

If you follow Green Day or Rancid there's no reason why you won't enjoy this album. Of course you may find yourself blushing to half the songs. A (Adam Dlugacz)

Girls is made of sugar & spice

Beautiful actresses steal show; Branagh haunts in Othello

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

BEAUTIFUL GIRLS
Directed by Ted Demme with Timothy Hutton, Matt Dillon, Uma Thurman
Playing at Hampshire Six

For all of the beautiful girls in this movie, there sure aren't many attractive men.

I'm not talking about physical features here, because that's not what this film is about. Beautiful Girls is about the inner workings of men and women in relationships and how each make life-altering decisions. The maturity and togetherness of the women in the film contrasted with the infantile indecisiveness of the men makes the females the more beautiful sex.

Set in a boring, working-class town somewhere in the suburbs of Massachusetts, a group of twentysomethings ponder their respective situations in life as their five-year high school reunion approaches.

Timothy Hutton stars as the one guy who escaped the sleepy town, becoming a bar pianist in New York City. The reunion is not the only thing that brings him home, however; he is fleeing from making a serious commitment to his kind and patient lawyer girlfriend (Annabeth Gish).

Once home, Hutton hangs out with his old high school pals, mostly drinking beer and listening to them complain about needing supermodels — real girls are too much trouble. This philosophy is coined by the boisterous Michael Rapaport, who is trying to get back together with his girlfriend of seven years (Martha Plimpton) who dumped him for his — what else? — non-committal attitude.

Matt Dillon leads the pack of hometown dwellers, running a snowplowing operation with his buddies. His character is poised on the edge of a cliche chasm — his former high- school quarterback attitude obviously holds him back in life, and he knows it. An affair with high-school flame Lauren Holly threatens to ruin a relationship with current girlfriend, a tender Mira Sorvino.

Uma Thurman floats into town resembling the "supermodel" the men desire, and with instant friendliness and innocent encounters, actually makes these guys learn a thing or two about women. Thurman's character is refreshingly respectable — teaching us about what makes a long-distance love last.

The seemingly endless cast of characters continues (perhaps the only potentially damaging aspect of the film is that with so many actors, many plotlines are left hanging), including Rosie O'Donnell, who has a wonderfully explosive scene in which she strolls through a drugstore with Dillon and Rapaport, picking up Penthouse magazines instructing them on what not to think about women.

The beautiful girl who steals the show is teen actress sensation Natalie Portman. Last seen dazzling audiences with her adult acting talents in Heat, Portman is impressive as Hutton's 13-year-old neighbor who proves to be more intelligent and mature than the men. Hutton is so smitten with this girl that he wishes she was older, but the attraction is as innocent as Portman's porcelain features.

Though the story can become slow at times, constantly reminding us of humdrum life in snowy suburbs, each of the characters's tales woven together keep the film from falling apart. But if for no other reason, see it for the beautiful girls. B

Matt Dillon stars as a snowplowing slacker in Beautiful Girls.

OTHELLO
Directed by Oliver Parker with Laurence Fishburne, Kenneth Branagh
Playing at Amherst Cinema

Movies like Othello are a constant reminder of why Shakespearian plays are classics — the romance, greed, corruption and villainy that ran through the blood of 16th century characters still enthrall audiences today.

The tragedy about the Moor of Venice is brought to life by seasoned Shakespearian actor and adaptor Kenneth Branagh and the formidable Laurence Fishburne. Branagh (whose credits include Much Ado About Nothing and Henry V) plays Iago, an evil officer of in the military service of Venice who is jealous of the Moor Othello.

Iago intricately plots against Othello, using the brave Moor's one weakness — his love for the senator's daughter, Desdemona (Irene Jacob). In his youth, Othello was saved from slavery by the senator, Brabantio, who raised him and supported him. Desdemona fell in love with him, but because of social class status and their different races, the lovers were forced to elope.

Once the deed was done, however, Desdemona's father was forced to give the couple his blessing. Iago becomes even more enraged, and his backstabbing (literally and figuratively) begins.

Branagh captures Iago's wickedness poignantly, as he flashes psychotic eyes at the camera, staring directly into the lens during his soliloquies. Iago is completely consumed with a passion against Othello that eats him up inside.

Fishburne tops himself as Othello, playing the Moor with a dramatic ease and a tough sensitivity. His giant figure and upright stature bend to his loving Desdemona — but not too much. To see the bald, tattooed-headed Fishburne cry in desperation is enough to move anybody.

Jacob's portrayal of Desdemona, though muffled by her male counterparts too soon, is a delicate one. As her eyes meet Othello's, full of innocent adoration, we are convinced of her love for the brave Moor.

The film is very dialogue-laden, with few scene changes or action, a dedication to the text that Shakespeare fans will appreciate. Anyone who knows the tragedy of Othello should re-live the sad story again. It will break your heart every time. A

Tori Spelling starred in the bad-movie-of-the-week. In CBS's "Coed Call Girl," Spelling played a bespectacled pre- med student with slight financial problems. A prank by a girlfriend lands Spelling in with a escort service. Eventually Spelling gets tired of being at everyone's beck-and-call and the guy who runs this agency, a Mafia-wannabe, threatens to ruin Spelling if she leaves. She shoots him in an anti- climactic scene and is charged with attempt to murder.

There were several things wrong with this movie. First the title has to be cheesiest and dumbest idea yet. Then there is the plot itself, which was allegedly based on actual events, but was more unrealistic than anything. Finally, there was the brilliant idea of casting Spelling in the lead role. With attempts like this, it's no wonder that CBS is trailing the other networks.

CBS is also home to the politically correct "Dr. Quinn, Medicine Woman." This past week, Dr. Quinn (Jane Seymour) was forced to stay home to take care of her unborn child, while a male doctor with decidedly chauvinistic ideas took over her practice. Dr. Quinn's husband, Sully, set off after kidnappers who had taken Matthew (Chad Allen) hostage. Of course everything turned out well and it was a happy ending for everyone concerned.

NBC scored big when it tied together the plots of two of its most riveting dramas, "Homicide" and "Law & Order." NBC's "Sisters" is still on the air for some unknown reason. The drama, which was once known for good acting and solid scripting, has deteriorated into an inane comedy. The show, with the Emmy-award winning Sela Ward as its backbone, somehow survived the departures of George Clooney ("ER"), Julienne Phillips, Ashley Judd and J Anderson. The character played by Anderson, Charlie, was replaced by "LA Law's" Sheila Kelley.

How the cast manages to keep a straight face through the hour-long show is incredible. Last week, Teddy's wedding was interrupted by a frantic call from the hospital saying that a heart has been found for Big Al. The whole wedding party troops down to the hospital, decked out in bridal finery, where they all proceed to have stupid little adventures. Teddy, almost married to Dr. Sorenson, finds a woman named Cindy who claims to be giving birth to Dr. Sorenson's baby. Then Georgie chases her ex-lover through the corridors of the hospital while Charlie plays the ministering angel to a basketball player who dies of a cerebral hemorrhage.

An another alleged drama is "Melrose Place." What gives with this show anyway? The highly-touted two-hour episode that advertised two deaths was, to be frank, dumb. Probably the only good thing about the episode was that Brooke (Kristin Davis) fell into the pool and died. Of course it is still questionable whether she will actually stay dead. She did show up in ghost form to torment Billy (Andrew Shue) and the thought of Brooke knocking around as a hysterical ghost laughing manically is somewhat nauseating. By the way, the other death? Richard, the mentally unstable kook who was stalking Kimberly (Marcia Cross).

February sweeps is the time when networks bring out the new episodes and big name guest stars, but the way the last two weeks have shaped out, it's a miracle that anyone is watching anything at all.

debut solo CD.

Noonan's soaring alto voice exudes a certain warm calmness in her listeners. Absolution, although clearly folk and country influenced, has many musical inspirations including early Irish and English melodies. Some of her lyrics, like much of today's country, are about everyday life crises and love gone lost. In "Hard Way," Noonan chants about a lonely man who has just lost his girlfriend: "I am not tired of living/ With no one by my side/ When a man is down with no one/ It's a harder way to die."

But Noonan digs deeper and writes about everything from religious guilt to trains. In the title track, a woman is torn over her spirituality: "You can find me down by the river/ You can see me kneel at the cross/ When she prays that God will forgive her/ She still thinks her soul is lost." Noonan's powerful singing is so moving one can almost feel the pain of the woman begging for forgiveness.

Inarguably she sounds like Mary Chapin-Carpenter. But while Carpenter has managed to carve herself a niche in Nashville, Noonan's music transcends the traditional country genre. Noonan has a certain quality that sets her apart from many of her counterparts, including record label mate Allison Krauss. Although she seems to have taken many of her musical attributes from contemporary country artists and earlier folk singers, her voice seems fresher, more distinctive.

The only fault, if it can even be classified as such, is the consistent slow tempo that is carried throughout the CD. She lacks the upbeat song that makes you want to get up and dance. But nevertheless the depth of her songwriting and beautiful voice overrides this tiny flaw. Considering the mecca of new country/folk music that has been released lately, Absolution is a worthwhile find. It is scheduled to be released in late spring. B+ (Lisa M. Oliveri)

Intimate film about black poet offers personal look

By Wiebke Schweer
Collegian Staff

"I made a praise to my pen: Never to let it lie...," said poet Audre Lorde in the movie A Litany for Survival: The Life and Work of Audre Lorde, which was shown Tuesday night at the Augusta Savage Gallery in the New Africa House.

Filmmakers Ada Gay Griffin and Michelle Parkinson have created a colorful collage about Lorde, a self-described black, lesbian, feminist, warrior, mother and poet. The movie is an intimate look at the poet's life, her work and thoughts.

The film owes its intimacy to interviews with Audre Lorde and conversations with her close friends, admirers and children. Also adding to the personal dimension are pictures depicting Lorde's childhood, youth, relationships and travels. Filmed scenes of New York during the time of her childhood, the Vietnam war and various demonstrations for the black civil rights and the feminist, gay and lesbian movements illustrate Lorde's background and her eventual development as an activist and a committed writer.

The various pictures, scenes and interviews Griffin and Parkinson collected over years, are accompanied by readings of poetry and music. All of these aspects make the movie a vivid documentation of the African-American writer, who was honored with the American Book Award in 1989 and unfortunately lost in her struggle against breast cancer in 1992.

"I grew up in a time when normal and good were defined as male and white," Lorde said of her childhood.

Lorde was born in Harlem as one of three daughters of West Indian parents. Described as a wild, sensitive and very bright child, she started writing poetry in high school with a love poem, which was criticized by the teachers as too frank.

"I had a need in me for something that wasn't there, a need to write," Lorde said, explaining her first steps into poetry and then she let on that she basically learned writing by reading poems.

After finishing high school and leaving home, Lorde increasingly discovered her lesbian identity, yet married a white man and gave birth to two children.

"There was no other possibility for us young women at that time than getting married," one of her friends said in the movie. "But we knew we could still have each other."

The movie explores Lorde's personal struggles in life. Between raising two children in an interracial marriage, writing poetry, getting involved in political activities and letting out her lesbian identity, Lorde started to express her lesbian experiences and feelings undisguised in her poetry and finally left her husband to live with her female friend and the children.

"I had to find out who I wanted to be and what I wanted to do and then combine the two things," she pointed out in one of the interviews.

The various political events and human rights movements during the '60s and '70s influenced Lorde's works and convinced her to become more and more politically active. Lorde held speeches, walked in the first line at demonstrations, gave seminars and established with other black women a magazine for their concerns.

"Liberation is not a private problem of one particular group," she said. "We can use our differences to work together."

The movie documented respectfully how Lorde carried on with her activities until the end of her life and how her influence and her poetry live on after her death.

The interviews with Lorde's friends and poet colleagues show how their life and work was influenced and enriched by the poet, either through her writing, her political activities and, most importantly, her friendship.

"Audre was our model," one friend said. "Her way to live her life created for us a new world."

Eclectic music influences Bowker concert

By Matt Sinclair
Collegian Staff

The Alison Brown Quartet will undoubtedly mark a high- point on the Fine Arts Center concert calendar when it plays tonight at Bowker Auditorium. Led by Grammy-nominated Alison Brown, (named Banjo Player of the Year in 1991 by the Bluegrass Music Association), the group will perform a repertoire of original music that blends jazz, Celtic and Latin influences.

The quartet's primary instrument is the banjo, but Brown will be joined by three other outstanding musicians with expertise in their own instruments: John R. Burr, piano and keyboards; Gary West, bass; and Rick Reed, drums and percussion.

The Quartet's pedigree is undisputed. This year it was the only U.S. act selected to appear at Scotland's prestigious Shetland Island Folk Festival. The Quartet was also chosen by the U.S. Arts America Program to tour Central and South America in the fall of 1994.

Other accolades include a Grammy Nomination for Simple Pleasures, and their album View From Above was chosen by NASA as the wake-up music for the Columbia flight of March '94.

Appearances have included such venues as Carnegie Hall, The Shetland Island Folk Festival, Telluride Bluegrass Festival and the Strawberry Music Festival.

Born in Connecticut and raised in California, Brown began playing the guitar at the age of eight. Her early skill with finger-picking made it a natural progression to move on to the more advanced banjo. Later, as an undergraduate at Harvard University, Alison hosted "Living Traditions in Bluegrass" for the University's radio station, WHRB.

After receiving an MBA in finance and marketing from UCLA, Alison worked as an investment banker in San Francisco for two years. She finally came to the realization that her heart was still in music and decided to take a six- month break from work. During that time she concentrated on writing the music which became the foundation of her debut album... Simple Pleasures. Brown never looked back and has been writing and performing ever since.

The Alison Brown Quartet is performing tonight at 8pm in Bowker Auditorium. Tickets are $15, $10 and $8. Tickets for five College students are $5. Tickets available from FAC Box Office and Bowker Auditorium an hour before the performance. For more information, please call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

UMass alum to perform at the Bluewall

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

A former resident of the Pioneer Valley and University of Massachusetts alum will bring her passionate and soulful music to the Bluewall Cafe this Friday night. Dayna Kurtz will perform one free show at 8 p.m. as part of the "Something Every Friday" program.

Kurtz is known for her incredible voice and riveting poetic lyrics. Combined with her vocal ability is an "intricate, dewdrop-on-a-spiderweb guitar style" that Kurtz uses to create to form a spine-tingling and passionate live performance.

Kurtz, who writes all her own music, currently resides in the New York City area and has traveled far and wide performing her unique music.

Jose Tolson, who coordinates the "Something Every Friday" series describes Kurtz as a very talented singer/songwriter. He also noted Kurtz's exceptional guitar talent and sensuous voice.

Opening for the show are two well known musicians, also from the valley. Vocalists and musicians Eshu Bumpus and Doug McMillan will perform a short program of recently arranged originals and soulful ballad standards.

"Something Every Friday" is made possible by grant from the UMass Auxiliary Services and the Vice-Chancellor's Office.

The performance is free and open to the public. The Bluewall is located in the Campus Center at UMass. For more information, please called 545-3600.

Film festival to benefit AIDS

By Seema Gangatirkar

The western Massachusetts chapter of the Design Industries Foundation Fighting AIDS (DIFFA) will present the second Film for Life festival at Sage Hall at Smith College this Friday. The program begins Friday night at 7:30 p.m. with The Darian Gap, a film by University of Massachusetts alum Brad Anderson.

The Darian Gap was one of only 18 films to be invited from a field of 500 submissions to be screened at the prestigious 1996 Sundance Film Festival.

In The Darian Gap, 29-year-old Lyn is broke and homeless. Life in Boston has become a drag and he dreams of escaping down the Pan American Highway to Patagonia where he can capture the legendary giant sloth on his sole possession — a video camera. Lyn's only obstacles are his new fashion-designer girlfriend, an estranged father and the Darian Gap, an 80-mile Panamanian swamp that interrupts the highway.

After the screening, Anderson and his co-producer, Jim Taylor, will make an appearance. A backstage reception will follow.

A former winner of the New England Film and Video Festival, Anderson has produced and directed several short films and has worked as film editor on such films as Sankofa (by acclaimed filmmaker Haile Gerima) and the PBS series' The Americas and Making Sense of the '60s.

The Friday night Late Show at 10:30 p.m. offers a pair of films. Rendezvous in Puntarenas by Miranda Devin portrays an American filmmaker who journeys to the Costa Rican fishing port of Puntarenas to make a film about street children. While in Costa Rica the filmmaker's rendezvous with a Peace Corps friend is thwarted and she finds herself more and more entwined in the lives of the local people she meets.

The Tourist is described by filmmaker Robert Moss as "an autobiographical mediation . . . about the horrible and humorous ways my life as a cameraman and prospective adoptive father make me a tourist in my own life." Shot in Africa, Japan, Belize, Hungary, Texas, Death Valley and his home in Massachusetts, The Tourist weaves scenes of freelance travel with the personal story of Moss and his wife's difficulty having children.

General seating ticket prices are as follows: $10 for both Friday screenings and The Darian Gap reception. $5 for the Friday 10:30 p.m. show only. Tickets are available at the door one hour before showtime or in advance at the Northampton Box Office. For more information, call (413) 586-8686 or 1-800-THE-TICK.

COLLEGE BASKETBALL

Kentucky gets by Georgia, UConn drills West Va.

No. 2 Kentucky 86, Georgia 73

LEXINGTON, Ky. (AP) — Mark Pope scored 16 points and grabbed 11 rebounds, and No. 2 Kentucky needed to hit 30 of 38 foul shots to turn back Georgia 86-73 for its 20th straight victory Wednesday night.

Kentucky (21-1, 11-0 Southeastern Conference) had more turnovers than an opponent for the first time this season (22-19) and shot just 43 percent (25-of-58) from the field. Georgia made 13 of 21 free throws.

Georgia (14-8, 5-7), taking its worst loss of the season, rallied from a 45-28 halftime deficit to 77-71 on Katu Davis' two free throws with 1:12 remaining.

Georgia was forced to foul and Kentucky responded by making seven of 10 free throws along with Allen Edwards' breakaway dunk to pull away to the final margin.

Kentucky's leading scorers this season, Tony Delk (19) and Antoine Walker (15.8) were on the bench during Georgia's comeback in the final four minutes.

Delk finished with 15 points, while Derek Anderson and Anthony Epps each had 13 and Edwards 11.

Davis had 15 points, Carlos Strong 12 and Terrell Bell 10 for Georgia, which shot 39 percent (27-of-70). The Bulldogs turned the ball over just six times in the second half.

Georgia, which lost to Kentucky 82-77 on Jan. 24, took a 10-3 lead, but Kentucky's fullcourt defensive pressure started creating turnovers, which it converted into nine points during a 12-4 run. Georgia regained the lead on Steve Jones' short jumper 14 seconds later, its last of the game. After hitting seven of its first 12 shots, Georgia missed 16 of 20 in falling behind 17 at halftime.

Epps, Delk and Pope each sank 3-pointers during a 13-0 run that gave Kentucky a 48-28 lead, and the margin increased to 58-36 on McCarty's dunk off a turnover with 14:20 to go.

Georgia, trailing 66-48 with 8:44 left, mounted a 16-6 run to slice the lead to 72-64 on Pertha Robinson's 3 five minutes later. But the Bulldogs would get no closer than 77-71 on Davis' two free throws.

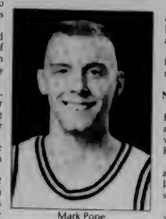
No. 3 Connecticut 87, West Virginia 69

STORRS, Conn. (AP) — Doron Sheffer had six 3-pointers and scored 23 points to lead No. 3 Connecticut to an 87-69 victory over West Virginia on Wednesday night, the Huskies' 22nd consecutive win. Ray Allen and Kirk King added 13 points each for the Huskies (23-1, 13-0 Big East), while Rudy Johnson had 12 and Travis Knight 10.

The Mountaineers (9-13, 4-10) stayed with the Huskies until midway through the first half when Sheffer hit consecutive 3-pointers and Knight added a layup to give UConn a 24-16 lead with 8:53 left.

After Gordon Malone dunked, Kirfg, Ricky Moore and Dion Carson combined for five straight points to make it 29-18 on the way to a 45-35 halftime lead.

The Huskies gradually built the lead to 75-54 with 7:33 left before West Virginia made one final run. Five points by Seldon Jefferson and a dunk by Sandro Varejao made it 79-67, but that was as close as the Mountaineers got.



Mark Pope

Damien Owens had 16 points and nine assists to lead West Virginia, while Jefferson had 14 points, Brent Solheim 13 and Malone 12.

Sheffer had six assists and three steals for the Huskies, while Knight had nine rebounds and five assists.

No. 4 Villanova 79, Seton Hall 67

VILLANOVA, Pa. (AP) — Kerry Kittles scored 25 points in his final game at the duPont Pavilion as No. 4 Villanova won its eighth straight, beating Seton Hall 79-67 Wednesday night.

Villanova (22-3, 12-2 Big East) avenged its 78-73 defeat at Seton Hall on Jan. 17 and handed the Pirates their fifth straight loss.

Seton Hall (10-12, 6-8) played without senior point guard Danny Hurley for a second straight game. He sustained a concussion Feb. 7 against Rutgers and didn't make the trip. He's listed as day-to-day.

Eric Eberz added 15 points for the Wildcats, while Alvin Williams had 13 and Jason Lawson added 12 points, 13 rebounds and seven blocks.

Adrian Griffin led Seton Hall with 22 points and 11 rebounds. Leading 47-25 at halftime, Villanova took its biggest lead of the game at 56-29 with 16:30 left on a layup by Williams.

Seton Hall got within 73-59 with 4:46 to go when Level Sanders made a layup to cap an 8-2 run.

After a layup by Williams, Griffin had a layup at the other end to cut the lead to 75-61 with 2:25 to play but it was too little, too late for the Pirates.

Kittles and Eberz scored 17 of Villanova's first 18 points in the game as the Wildcats used a 10-0 run to take an 18-11 lead with 11:20 remaining.

The Pirates got within 20-15 on a layup by Sanders, but that is when Villanova pulled away. Over the next seven minutes, Seton Hall was outscored 25-4 and trailed by as many as 26 points.

Seton Hall shot just 30 percent in the first half and missed each of its four 3-point attempts while committing 11 turnovers. The Wildcats, led by Kittles' 14 points and 11 by Eberz, was 16-of-31 from the field (51 percent) in the opening half. Villanova blocked eight shots in the half, four by Lawson.

Hurley is the Pirates' second-leading scorer at 15.0 points per game and their leading assist man at 5.3. Without him, Seton Hall had just two first-half assists.

The Pirates are 1-8 on the road this season.

This was the Wildcats' final game of the season at the duPont Pavilion, where they have won 15 straight. Villanova will play its final home game Feb. 25 at the Spectrum against No. 3 Connecticut.

No. 5 Kansas 85, Colorado 70

LAWRENCE, Kan. (AP) — Raef LaFrentz dominated inside to score 20 points and No. 5 Kansas scored the first 13 points of the second half as the Jayhawks beat Colorado 85-70 Wednesday night.

The Jayhawks (20-2, 8-1 Big Eight) led 44-30 after the run that started the second half. Colorado got within 44-38 on a 3-pointer by Mack Tuck, but Scot Pollard scored on a dunk off an inbounds pass and Paul Pierce made two free throws to restore the lead to 10 points.

Colorado (8-13, 2-7) then made three straight turnovers and shot an airball on its next four possessions to lose for the 13th straight time to the Jayhawks. Kansas won its 27th straight at home.

The Buffaloes outplayed the Jayhawks in Boulder in Ricardo Patton's first game as coach after the surprise resignation of Joe Harrington before losing 80-78.

B.J. Williams turned a steal by Jerod Haase into a three-point play to give Kansas a 64-45 lead with 8:45 to play, and Williams then stole the ball and found Jacque Vaughn for an uncontested layup and a 66-45 lead.

Chauncey Billups scored 21 points to lead Colorado, but most of those came after the game was decided. Martice Moore had 14 points and Tuck finished with 13.

No. 17 North Carolina 53, Clemson 48

CLEMSON, S.C. (AP) — Jeff McInnis had a career-high 25 points, all but one on 3-pointers, and No. 17 North Carolina ended its three-game losing streak with a 53-48 victory over Clemson on Wednesday night.

It certainly didn't look like the usual efficient Tar Heels — only five players scored in their lowest offensive performance this year. But whenever North Carolina (17-7, 8-4 Atlantic Coast Conference) seemed to stagger, McInnis nailed a long range bomb. Terrell McIntyre missed an NBA 3-pointer with six seconds to go and Clemson trailing 51-48. The Tigers (14-7, 4-7) lost for the seventh time in 10 games after starting 11-0.

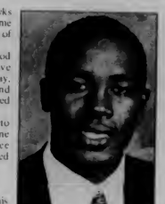
McInnis' seventh 3-pointer gave North Carolina its first lead in more than 12 minutes, 44-42. And after Tom Wideman again tied it with a putback basket, McInnis stroked his final 3 to put North Carolina ahead for good.

A Tar Heels loss would have meant only the second four-game losing streak in the last 31 years under coach Dean Smith. Antwan Jamison had 12 points and Shammond Williams 10 for North Carolina. Dante Calabria was held to three points and starting center Serge Zwikker, averaging 10 points, went scoreless. Tony Christie had 12 points, all in the first half, to lead Clemson.

Much was made of Smith's shouting matches with Clemson coach Rick Barnes, but the two shook hands warmly on Valentine's Day and the game went off without a serious argument.

Midway through the second half, Barnes yelled at the referees to bring Smith to the scorer's table. Smith had been gesturing with Clemson guard Bill Harder.

North Carolina didn't fall behind early this time only because of the McInnis' 3-point shooting. He swished two in the game's first minute and made five of six from the distance in the first half. A layup by Wideman with three seconds left gave Clemson a 32-30 lead, the sixth straight game North Carolina trailed at halftime.



Jacques Vaughn

Indiana 72, No. 9 Penn St. 54

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. (AP) — Indiana beat the flu, and then took care of Penn State.

Brian Evans scored 32 points as the Hoosiers overcame a flu bug that wiped out half the team early this week and beat the ninth-ranked Nittany Lions 72-54 Wednesday night.

The loss dropped Penn State (18-3, 9-3 Big Ten) a half game behind first place Purdue in the conference race. Indiana (15-9, 8-4) remained in third place.

Five Indiana players were hit by the flu after the team's return from Iowa on Sunday. Andrae Patterson spent one night in the hospital, and a workout was cancelled on Tuesday when four other Hoosiers were too ill to practice.

Indiana led only 34-30 with about seven minutes to go before Evans, one of the Hoosiers who managed to escape the bug, started an 18-4 streak with two baskets. Penn State got only one free throw by Matt Gaudio and a 3-pointer by Glenn Sekunda the rest of the game.

The Nittany Lions, who came in as the nation's most accurate 3-point shooting team at 45.3 percent, missed their first nine 3-point attempts in the second half before Sekunda's basket. They finished 5-for-22 for the game.

Sekunda led Penn State with 18 points, while Gaudio added 10. Charlie Miller added 13 points for the Hoosiers.

from Thomas in the backcourt, and laid it in while getting fouled, bringing the crowd to its feet and UMass to a six- point advantage 51-45.

From then on it was all UMass, as Duquesne failed to score for eight minutes and 12 seconds, until Trixie Wolf's layup with 2:45 left stopped the Minutewomen's unanswered run.

But by that time UMass was up 63-47, and the game was out of reach.

UMass shot 60 percent for the game while Duquesne shot 31 percent. However, a disturbing stat for the Minutewomen was their 16 assists to 27 turnovers.

"We had a lot of unforced turnovers tonight," O'Brien said. "Twenty-seven was a lot. But it was a situation in which we controlled most of them and that's something we can correct."

Rebounding was a big key in last night's contest as the Minutewomen doubled up the Lady Dukes, cleaning up the glass with 58 boards to their 19.

The Minutewomen are riding a four-game winning streak, and will play next at Fordham on Sunday in an Atlantic 10 conference matchup at 12 p.m.

"Our focus is going to be taking care of Fordham on Sunday, then coming back and taking care of Dayton on Wednesday," O'Brien said. "We'll go, have some fun and see what happens."

UMass as a whole took charge with a suffocating press that left Duquesne tired and sloppy. The Dukes were forced to pass the ball to break the press. By the time they got to the other end, the clock was running out and the Minutemen kept them from getting solid looks at the hoop.

UMass coach Joanie O'Brien's squad is at the top of its game, finally finding consistent offensive and defensive play from a team that was caught in a win-one, lose-two groove for much of January. Last night, the Minutewomen proved that consistency is back, as they have now won four games in a row, their largest streak of the year.

UMass now holds the No. 2 spot in the A-10 East as it's tie with St. Joseph's was snapped when the Hawks lost to La Salle on Monday, dropping them to the No. 3 spot. UMass enters a three-game road trip before returning home to face the No. 1 Rhode Island Rams. The battle for the top two spots in each division are crucial in the new expanded conference as both earn first round byes in the tournament.

"When you're trying to set yourself up for the Atlantic 10 tournament, you want to control your own destiny," O'Brien said. "Right now, we're in a position to do that. Are we going to catch Rhode Island? I don't know, but we have to make sure we finish first or second."

JAMEY REY/COLLEGIAN

Jaywana Bradley scored four points in 16 minutes of action off the bench for UMass last night.

ing 10.2 points, dishing out 153 assists (while committing only 54 turnovers) and notching 60 steals. On more than one occasion this season, Massachusetts coach John Calipari has called Padilla the best point guard he's ever coached.

Donta Bright (15.3 ppg, 5.3 rpg) and Dana Dingle (10.3 ppg, team-high 7.6 rpg) have been playing well as of late as well for UMass.

If the Minutemen can play as well as they did against Temple on Sunday, when they drilled the Owls 84-55, they should have no problem defeating the Explorers.

"I watched what they did to Temple," Morris said. "When you can do that to Temple, just do what they did to that team, it's kind of scary. I think they are a terrific team.

"We'll go up there and play hard, and see what happens. We think we can win every game and will go up there and think we can [win]. Crazy things happen, we'll see, you never know."

flourished. Utah, a team which was not lauded nearly as much as State in the early-season polls, has jumped to No. 7 in the country, according to the latest AP poll.

The reason for the Utes recent success is one man: Keith Van Horn. Van Horn, last year's Western Athletic Conference Player of the Year, has quietly led the Utes this season in scoring in almost every game.

He is currently ninth on the Utah career scoring list, and ninth on the career rebound list. He was the first sophomore to lead the WAC in scoring and rebounding.

This year he has been the high-scorer for the Utes in 15 of 21 games, is averaging 20.9 points per game and has been the high rebounder nine times.

The similarities between Dampier's Bulldogs and Van Horn's Utes are obvious. Both players are junior centers, Van Horn is 6-foot-9, Dampier stands at 6-foot-11. Both have been the driving forces behind their teams success this year. Yet it is striking to see the differences in the teams' success.

• Bob Knight has a sweet side. Literally.

Coaching a group of youngsters, Knight kicks back and relaxes, making a pitch for NutraSweet. His fictional players fumble through a practice and brace themselves for a Knight tirade, but the usually all-business coach just laughs and jokes.

"So they miss a basket," he says in the spot. "It's just a game."

• Name change: Former New Jersey Governor Brendan Byrne's name has been removed from the arena in the Meadowlands Sports Complex. The arena will now be known as the Continental Airlines Arena, as the air line bought the sponsoring rights for $2 million.

• Rule changes: In effect this year, any player ejected from more than one game for fighting must automatically sit out the remainder of the year.

In effect next year: Team rosters will not be allowed to list both No. 0 and No. 00.

• Starting next year, the Final Four will be played in domed stadiums through the year 2002. The sites that have been announced are:

1996 — The Meadowlands, East Rutherford, NJ
1997 — The Hoosier Dome, Indianapolis, IN
1998 — The Alamo Dome, San Antonio, TX
1999 — The Thunderdome, St.Petersburg, FL
2000 — The Hoosier Dome, Indianapolis, IN
2001 — The Metrodome, Minneapolis, MN
2002 — The Georgia Dome, Atlanta, GA

There are three reasons why the savvy Knick front office clearly came out on top of this deal. First, Smith was no longer welcome in New York, and in unloading his ill- conceived long-term deal, the Knicks cleared away valuable salary cap room. Secondly, most forget that Reid once showed positive signs as a back-up to Rodman and only digressed when he was forced into a starting role after Rodman's departure. Since Charles Oakley is engraved in the Knick lineup, Reid can once again revert to a role better suited for him.

Lastly, Reid is a free agent at the end of the season and the Knicks now (essentially) have three first-round picks this year. Bottom line: Chalk up one for Dave Checketts & Co. en route to the quickest rebuilding job in NBA history.

Of many other possible moves, a realistic possibility is such: John Starks and a 1996 first-round draft choice to Golden State for Tim Hardaway. It is no secret that Hardaway desperately wants out of the Bay area and would love nothing more than to be re-united with former coach Don Nelson.

Starks, who really has never recovered from "the game," is now expendable due to the promising rise of hired gun, Hubert Davis. Also, it was Nelson that cut Starks years ago in Oakland and still seems unable to mesh with the streaky guard.

Spanning the "Globe"

• Congrats to Stern on receiving a well-deserved (five- year, $45 million) extension. Hey, I guess there's no salary cap on the league office.

• How desperate are the Miami Heat for a healthy guard? They actually signed Jeff Malone. Yes he was cut by the 76ers. What's up in Armanivillo?

• T-Wolves gone a-trey. Did you know that Mass guard George McCloud has made as many three pointers (103) as the entire Minnesota team. Think General Manager Kevin McHale has thought about calling his old buddy Danny Ainge?

• Chris Dudley is finally rubbing off on his teammates. The Portland Trail Blazers are on pace to finish the season with the lowest free throw percentage (63.1%) in NBA history. Hmm, is it possible that current Blazers head coach P.J. Carlisemo will use all these bricks to build himself a house on the St. John's campus next season?

Next week: "Where are they now?"

Indians gear up for season

By Chuck Melvin
Associated Press

CLEVELAND — They used to invite dozens of pitchers to camp, hoping to find someone who at least wouldn't be an embarrassment on opening day.

Those days are long gone for the Cleveland Indians.

Having won their division last season by a record 30 games and played in the World Series for the first time in 41 years, the Indians will be overwhelming favorites to make it back in 1996.

"The talent level of this club is such that we can contend with anybody," said manager Mike Hargrove, who will welcome pitchers and catchers to camp in Winter Haven, Fla., on Thursday.

The spring will be mostly a tune-up for the Indians, because their roster is nearly set. The only questions:

— Who will be the fifth starter?

— Will they carry 11 pitchers or 12?

— If they go with 11, as is likely, will the extra position player be an infielder or an outfielder?

"I don't think the holes we have to fill this year are as large as they were last year or the year before that," Hargrove said recently. "Signing Jack McDowell is the big reason for that."

The Indians made two significant acquisitions over the winter, signing McDowell to a two-year, $10.15 million deal and Julio Franco to a two-year, $5 million contract. They also re-signed or extended the contracts of Orel Hershiser, Charles Nagy, Eddie Murray and Omar Vizquel, among others.

McDowell, 15-10 with a 3.93 ERA for the Yankees last year, won the Al Cy Young award in 1993, the last time baseball played a full season. Because he has been so sturdy, the Indians will feel more comfortable reducing the size of their pitching staff to 11; they had 12 on the roster much of last year.

Dennis Martinez, McDowell, Hershiser and Nagy give the Indians one of the best rotations in the league. They'll be joined by a fifth starter to be determined during spring training, with Chad Ogea, Mark Clark and Albie Lopez the leading candidates.

"Because we don't really have another spot open, whoever doesn't win that job is going to be sent down," Hargrove said. "That's a little unfair to people who have had success in the major leagues, but that's the reality of the situation. I don't like it any more than they do. It does make for good competition."

The bullpen is set, with Jose Mesa — who came out of nowhere to become one of the game's best closers last year — complemented by Julian Tavarez, Paul Assenmacher, Jim Poole, Alan Embree and Eric Plunk.

Offensively, the Indians let the streaky Paul Sorrento go to Seattle as a free agent because of the signing of Franco, who returns from a year in Japan. He'll play first base most days. "If Julio is true to his usual offensive output, we should have the same power numbers and maybe even a few more RBIs out of Julio than we got out of Paul," Hargrove said. "Julio's big plus is that he's a consistent hitter, another .300 hitter."

Franco most likely will bat second in the lineup, pushing Vizquel to the bottom of the order. That creates a typical lineup of Kenny Lofton (cf), Franco (1b), Carlos Baerga (2b), Albert Belle (lf), Murray (dh), Jim Thome (3b), Manny Ramirez (rf), Sandy Alomar (c) and Vizquel (ss).

No matter who plays, the Indians are guaranteed of performing to sell-out crowds all season. Every seat in Jacobs field for the '96 season was sold out by early December.

"We really do feed off that energy," said Hargrove, whose team won 27 games in its last at bat during the regular season last year. "Our fans do help. They helped us as the old ballpark, too. You just had to listen a little harder to hear them. Of course, they had to look a little harder for reasons to cheer back then." Indians pitchers and catchers will undergo physicals on Friday and have their first workout Saturday. The rest of the players report by Monday, with physicals Tuesday and the first full workout Wednesday.

Strong second–half propels Minutewomen to win

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

After being down five (45–40) with just over nine minutes left, the Massachusetts women's basketball team used a 23–0 run to come away with a 68–47 victory over Duquesne last night at the William D. Mullins Center, extending its undefeated home–winning streak to 11 games.

Octavia Thomas recorded 27 points on 10–for–14 shooting, (7 for 8 from the line) and grabbed 11 rebounds in 38 minutes. Melissa Gurile had 12 points and Beth Kuzmeski had 11, hitting three shots from downtown.

Massachusetts	68
Duquesne	47

UMass controlled the game early on leading by as much as 15 points (26–11) after Gurile's jump hook in the lane, with just over eight minutes to go in the first half.

However, Korie Hlede brought the Lady Dukes back with two outside jumpers, one off a steal, just before the end of the half. Hlede hit two more for part of her 12 first–half points, cutting the Minutewomen lead to 33–32, and outscoring them 15–5 during the last six minutes.

"The first half we didn't defend as well because we didn't score as well," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "The second half they got themselves under control, and we executed things a little bit better."

The Minutewomen did shoot 58 percent throughout the first half compared to Duquesne's 36 percent, but it was the 11–for–12 foul–shooting at the line for the Lady Dukes which kept it close.

The second half saw Duquesne jump out early behind two three pointers by Kelly Eberhardt, putting the Lady Dukes up by two, 40–38. The lead increased to five after Sherri Hannan drained a three from the right side. The teams then traded another basket each, and then came the drought for Duquesne and UMass' biggest run of the season.

The ferocious defense by Thomas held Hlede to just two points throughout the whole second half after her 12 in the first session.

"I thought our kids played with heart the whole 40 minutes," Duquesne coach Dan Durkin said. "Korie didn't have a great game. We need Korie to score, and she knows that, and she tries to get us going. She has that green light to do that. That gets everybody going. She's not going to be able to do that every night and tonight's the night that she wasn't able to do it."

You are down by five points with about 10 minutes remaining in the game. Your 10–0 home win streak is on the line and there are just four more games remaining in the regular season. Naturally, you step up and go on a 28–3 run to pull off the win and walk out of the William D. Mullins Center unscathed, right?

As amazing as that sounds, the Massachusetts women's basketball squad did just that last evening in a matchup with Duquesne. With a season–high three wins at their back the Minutewomen upped their record to 16–7, 8–4 in the Atlantic 10, while the Dukes dropped to 12–10, 8–4 in the A–10.

As of late, the Minutemen have been on fire in the shooting department. The senior co–captains Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile led UMass in scoring, each walking off the floor with double–doubles. Thomas earned a season–high 27 points on the evening just four points behind her career high, while pulling down 11 rebounds. Gurile chipped in with 12 points and managed to grab 10 boards against a struggling Duquesne defense.

Junior guard Beth Kuzmeski carried over her shooting finesse of last week's 18–point showing against Xavier with 11 points and two boards on the evening. Kuzmeski kept her cool, even when the Minutewomen were down and followed Thomas' lead.

"I thought, someone has to pick it up, make a great play and ignite the whole team," Kuzmeski said. "Whether it was Octavia or Mel on offense or Tricia on defense, somebody did it and we just followed the leader."

For the Dukes, their leader Korie Hlede, couldn't produce as she notched 14 points of the game, with only two of those coming in the second half.

"They matched up with me well," Hlede said. "I lost my rhythm for one or two minutes and then just couldn't get it back."

Thomas did a superb job keeping Hlede out of the play. As if earning a double–double wasn't enough, she proved to be a catalyst in the Minutewomen's defensive game. Knowing Hlede was the Duke's main offensive threat, Thomas shut her down. Take it from Hlede herself.

"Of course you always pay attention to a player like Octavia," Hlede said. "But tonight, she really took over, big time. Rebounding, taking the ball, penetrating — she did a great job."

Highlights...

The Minutewomen used a 23–0 in the second half to turn a close game into a blowout.. Thomas led the way for UMass recording her fourth double–double of the season (27 points, 11 boards).. Melissa Gurile also registered a double–double scoring 12 points and grabbing 10 boards.. Korie Hlede led the Dukes with 14 points but continued her struggle against the Minutewomen. Last season she had two of her worst games against UMass.. The Dukes shot just 31 percent for the game while UMass shot 60 percent.. The Minutewomen were particulary sloppy with the ball turning it over 27 times compared to Duquesne's 18

Mississippi St. isn't living up to hype

When the pre–season college basketball rankings came out in November, there were differing opinions as to which team deserved top honors. One thing that nearly all of the poll publications had in common was a high rank for Mississippi State.

With star junior center Erick Dampier leading the team, the Bulldogs were thought to be a major force for the upcoming season. The only problem with that plan is that essentially, the 'Dogs were a one–man team.

In 1994–1995 the Bulldogs ran their record to 22–8, and finished 12th in the final CNN/USA Today poll. This year the pre–season Sports Illustrated poll had them as high as fourth.

Casey Kane on College Basketball

Unfortunately, the Bulldogs have not lived up to the pre–season hype. After starting the season with a four–game winning streak, they fell at home to Arkansas–Little Rock. State went on to rack up a six–game win streak, but its opponents were not exactly national powerhouses: Northeast Louisiana, Oregon State, Southern Miss...

Only recently has the team started to pull themselves back up into the AP Top 25. Recent quality wins over Auburn and Arkansas have meant a national ranking again for the Bulldogs, now No. 25.

Dampier has also had trouble living up to the pre–season media blitz. Billed as one of the top players in the nation in some magazines, Dampier has faded into the background as the year has progressed.

Not that he doesn't have the numbers — he does. Dampier has posted 20 or more points in four games this season, and has only been held to under ten points twice. He has recorded double–figures in rebounds eight times, and has only had two games in which he didn't record at least one block.

Mississippi State has faltered under the burden of being a one–man team, while another team has

O'Neal, not Jordan, All–star game MVP

The NBA's all–star break came and went this past weekend but not without leaving behind its share of surprises, highlights and rumors. Should Michael Jordan really have won the MVP of the all–star game? What rumors are being circulated as the league's trading deadline approaches? Does Commissioner David Stern deserve the new contract he just signed? With so much to cover, let's get right to it.

First and foremost, Jordan clearly should have not been given MVP of the game. Granted your Airness, you did have a great game (20 points, four rebounds), however Shaquielle O'Neal (25 points, 10 rebounds) should in fact have been the voters choice. In selecting Jordan, the voters are sending the wrong message to the fans. League marketing officials are constantly pushing the NBA's "new generation" of O'Neal, Alonzo Mourning & Co. And besides, Jordan has already won the award once before. Although the returns of Michael and Magic Johnson have given the game it's old flavor, the league will not properly progress with constant recognition of veterans.

O'Neal's monstrous dunk over David Robinson was the final exclamation point on his game–long display of authority. Oh, if he could only shoot free throws.

It is a shame that voting for the award takes place at the end of the third quarter, not at the commencement of the event, when it should be done.

• As the Feb. 22 trading deadline approaches rumors are constantly circulating about players futures. With a world class free agent crop in waiting, teams are jockeying for position for this season and beyond. Not every team has the patience to wait for the league's deadline. Last week, the New York Knicks pulled the trigger on a four–player deal.

The Knicks sent dis–appointing forward Charles Smith and little–used swingman Monty Williams to the Spurs for underachieving forward J.R. Reid, the "always dangerous" Brad Lohaus and a first–round draft choice. The Spurs have been searching for a big forward ever since they disposed of Dennis Rodman and for some reason believe Smith is their man.

Minutemen face Explorers

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

With its highly anticipated matchup with Atlantic 10 foe Virginia Tech coming up on Saturday, it's easy for the Massachusetts men's basketball team (23–0, 11–0 in the Atlantic 10) to overlook tonight's opponent, the La Salle Explorers.

In fact, the Hokies themselves were overlooking Saturday's big game when they played Liberty on Tuesday night, and escaped with a three–point win.

The Explorers come into the William D. Mullins Center tonight (7:30 p.m.) with a 5–18 overall record, 2–8 in the A–10.

"It's a great opportunity to go and see an undefeated and No. 1 team in the country at their place," La Salle coach Speedy Morris said. "It's such a great basketball atmosphere. This is a challenge. I'm excited and I think our kids will be too."

Senior Romaine Haywood is the Explorers go–to–guy and he comes in averaging 17.5 points and 7.1 rebounds per game. Sophomore Mike Gizzi is second on the team in scoring with a 15.1 average while fellow sophomore Shawn Smith is third, with 9.9 points per game. Smith also leads the team with 136 assists. Everett Catlin, a 6–foot–6 inch junior forward, leads the Explorers in rebounding with a 7.2 average to go along with a 7.8 scoring average. Olof Landgren (5.8 ppg) and Brian Flickinger (6.9 ppg) should give the Explorers quality minutes.

La Salle, who is heading to Amherst on the heels of a 90–50 loss to Villanova on Monday, must be aware of National Player of the Year candidate Marcus Camby, who leads the Minutemen with a 20.6 scoring average. Camby also leads UMass in blocks (77) while grabbing 7.2 rebounds a game, second on the team.

But Morris feels the key to the Minutemen's success has been the play of their guards, Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso.

"Obviously, they are not just Camby," he said. "I think their guards are terrific. They play so hard and their fun to watch."

Travieso was on fire against the Owls, scoring 26 points and nailing eight three–pointers to tie a school record. For the season he is the team's third leading scorer with 11.8 points per game.

Padilla has been playing an outstanding overall game of late, averag–

Students claim tenancy rights in Boulders suit

By Roseann Cohen
Collegian Staff

For some residents of "The Boulders," an apartment complex on East Hadley Road, there's just no escape from the winter cold. Even at home.

University of Massachusetts students Kelly Govoni and Joanne Nowak, both juniors, were taken to court recently by The Boulders, who sought to evict them for non–payment of rent. Nowak and Govoni, residents of 167I, claimed that they were withholding rent due to Board of Health violations concerning their lack of adequate heat and problems with their hot water. They, in turn, filed a counterclaim.

According to Massachusetts state laws regarding tenants' rights, it is within a tenant's power to withhold rent if the code violations pose a danger to a tenant's health and safety. In order to withhold rent the landlord must have knowledge of the violations prior to the time of rent withholding.

Nowak and Govoni allegedly reported their problems several times to The Boulders, and hand–delivered a letter to them on Nov. 1, 1995 explaining why they were withholding their rent that month.

"We realized there wasn't heat at the end of September, 1995 when we turned it on," Govoni said in court.

She also testified that they had problems with the water either being "scalding hot or freezing cold."

"We never knew what it would be," she said.

Govoni said that she and her roommates had made several calls to the office in October 1995 about those problems and various others.

Although maintenance staff had visited the apartment to make repairs, the problems persisted. Property manager Anne Kibbe told the court she had no knowledge, other than the letter she received on Nov. 1, 1995 that the problems had not been eradicated.

The Board of Health notified Kibbe about an inspection they conducted Nov. 6, 1995 which cited violations involving the hot water and faulty thermostat as conditions that would impair the health or safety of the tenants. Kibbe testified that upon speaking to the health inspector, she lowered the temperature of the hot water immediately. She said she did not replace the thermostat and was unaware it was a code violation, although she signed a Board of Health document citing it as a code violation.

Kibbe delivered the tenants a notice to quit the following day, without confirming with them whether the repairs had been sufficient.

Thomas Cosh, the attorney from Student Legal Services representing Govoni and Nowak explained, "It's our position in this case that the notice to quit and filing of the eviction case were taken in retaliation, because these tenants complained in writing, called the Board of Health, and exercised their legal right to withhold rent," he said.

Problems with the heating system continued into the winter. According to temperature logs kept by Nowak and Govoni, temperatures were often in the low 60s, although the thermostat was set for higher temperatures, and they were lower than Board of Health regulations. According to a Board of Health inspection on Dec.

DuBois Tower Library celebrates new name

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will host a four–day series of events, starting Feb. 20, to mark the official naming of the library in honor of W.E.B. DuBois.

The University's Board of Trustees voted on Oct. 5, 1994 to rename the building that houses over 100,000 items of the civil rights pioneer, author and Massachusetts native's work after DuBois.

David G. DuBois, visiting professor of Afro–American studies and journalism at UMass, will deliver the main address. He will focus on his stepfather's belief that the problem of the 20th century is the color line, and how it is becoming a problem of the 21st century.

Music professor Horace Boyer has coordinated a concert of spirituals and readings from DuBois' "The songs of Black Folk." The concert will be held at 7 p.m. on Feb. 21 in Bowker Auditorium.

According to Boyer, State Rep. Ellen Story [Amherst], State Rep. Ben Swan [Springfield], former UMass Chancellor Randolph Bromery and Dr. Esther Terry, the chair of the DuBois Department of African American Studies, will be reading selections from the book.

"A collection of 15 spirituals will be sung and interspersed between the spirituals will be readings," Boyer said.

The events will culminate with a ceremony at 11 a.m. on Feb. 23 in Bowker Auditorium, when honorary degrees will be awarded to Herbert Aptheker, an author on the work of DuBois; Rachel Robinson, the president of the Jackie Robinson Foundation and Randall Robinson, the founder and director of TransAfrica.

Aptheker taught American history at UMass in 1971–72 as the DuBois Lecturer. He has edited the three–volume work, "The Correspondence of W.E.B. DuBois" and "The Education of Black People."

Rachel Robinson, the widow of Jackie Robinson, developed her husband's construction company into a multimillion dollar company, which designs, builds and manages low–to–moderate income housing in the New York City area.

Randall Robinson led the campaign in Washington, D.C. to combat apartheid in South Africa with strict economic sanctions. He has also confronted the U.S. policy toward Haiti, the problem of Haitian immigrants, and the military dictatorship in Nigeria.

The series will include student and faculty teach–in activities on the life of DuBois, the official opening of the student exhibition "W.E.B. DuBois: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow" and a lecture by 1993 Pulitzer Prize winner David Levering Lewis, author of "W.E.B. DuBois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1909."

When DuBois moved to Ghana in 1961, he left many of his papers

Mexican students collaborate with UM grads

By Anastasia Kudrez

Editor's note: This is the last in a three–part series on the Large Millimeter Telescope project.

Teamwork is crucial for a scientific project, especially a binational, $49 million project.

The University of Massachusetts and the Instituto Nacional de Astrofísica, Optica y Electrónica (INAOE) in Mexico are building the largest millimeter telescope in the world.

The Large Millimeter Telescope (LMT) Vision states, "In order to succeed in building the observatory with finite resources, each partner needs the relationship. We are therefore committed to developing a collaboration which achieves our shared scientific and technical goals, while respecting our individual political and institutional needs."

The role of Mexico in the LMT project includes research, construction, and funding.

The UMass project director, Professor Stephen Strom explained that the LMT project was a result of 10 years of collaboration between the UMass astronomy department and Mexican colleagues.

"I have two former students in Mexico; it was a certain level of friendship that enabled the professional project," he said.

According to Strom, it became apparent in the early 1990s that Mexico would have competitive access to money from loans for development of scientific equipment. With matching funds from the U.S., the $49 million telescope could be built. In 1994, UMass and INAOE officially began the LMT project.

INAOE, located in the mountainous village Tonantzintla, Puebla, is responsible for three major scientific aspects of the LMT project.

One area of research is the theoretical analysis of the control system, the system that points the telescope. Researchers are also studying the problems of developing the surface of the dish, which consists of 126 computer–controlled panels.

Another INAOE research group is responsible for managing the development of the LMT's secondary mirror. The radiation is initially caught by the 50–meter main mirror. The radiation needs the relationship. We are therefore committed to developing a collaboration which achieves our shared scientific and technical goals, while respecting our individual political and institutional needs."

The third group of LMT researchers at INAOE is a combination of members from the electronics, optics and astronomy departments.

"Traditionally the departments have worked separately, but the LMT requires a complete lab to design, develop and test millimeter wavelengths," Medina said.

This new lab needs trained staff and students. In an effort to meet staffing needs, INAOE has sent five students to UMass last year. These students are working for their masters and doctoral degrees in the electrical engineering department. They also work closely with the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory (FCRAO). Once these students receive their degrees, they will return to the LMT labs at INAOE.

The research of INAOE, the UMass labs, and the FCRAO labs will be combined to build the LMT. The selection of contractors and the LMT's site is expected by the end of 1996. According to the project schedule, the LMT will be built and tested by June 2000.

Mexico has a history of astronomical achievement dating to pre–Columbian civilizations including the Aztecs and Mayans. During the second half of this century, Mexican astronomy advanced significantly at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM) and INAOE.

INAOE, 72 miles south–east of Mexico City, was originally an optical observatory. Founded in 1942, it housed a photographic Schmidt tele–

Snowstorm freezes time; Chapel clock hands broken

By Cheryl Schwartz
Collegian Correspondent

It was 11:30 for a long time last week as the clock in the Old Chapel tower temporarily stopped working.

John Nelson, a volunteer and mechanic for the Quasimodo Society, maintains the clock and tries to ensure that it is continuously running. Nelson said he suspects that during one of the snow storms over break, the minute hand on the clock facing west froze while the clock continued to run.

"The hand has become split away from the hub in which it attaches to the shaft of the clock," he said.

The counterweight, which balances the minute hand and is supposed to be 180 degrees from it, is now touching the minute hand. The other three clocks, facing north, south and east, were not affected and are presently running.

Robert Vernier, who works for the physics department machine shop, has offered to help layout new hands for the clock. He intends to replace the existing broken wood hands with magnesium.

Nelson plans to fix the hands by using a fire truck ladder to reach the clock from the outside, or breaking the glass and replacing the hands from the inside.

The tower clock was presented to the University by the class of 1892. Trustee I. Howe Diamond dedicated the tower bell also in 1892. The clock was illuminated in 1910.

Students wound the clock by hand until the mid 1930s, when an automatic winding system replaced the hand one.

Today, faculty and volunteers help to maintain the Chapel clock in order to preserve its history and symbolism to the university. Nelson, the director of the professional writing program in the English department, is one member of the small Campus Chime and Caroline Committee.

The Seth Thomas Movement has been keeping time since 1892.

Activist takes further actions to elect Weld pres.

By Lucy Brinicombe
Collegian Correspondent

On Wednesday, the National Draft Committee officially launched its campaign to urge Governor Weld to run for the presidency.

The committee, which has doubled its membership to two, has entitled their campaign "Operation Crimson Red" in reference to the state governor's hair color.

The Governor has reiterated his original decision not to run as a presidential candidate. He has said that family commitments and his obligation to his constituency as governor are of greater priority than the time and resources that would need to be devoted to run a presidential campaign.

However, Committee Chairman Martin Jones, a journalism major from the University of Massachusetts, claims that it is now a matter of national duty that Weld run in the presidential race. Jones said this is particularly true following conservative commentator and candidate for the Republican presidential nomination Pat Buchanan's performance at Iowa and the subsequent likelihood he will win the New Hampshire primary on Tuesday.

Should Buchanan be successful in next week's primary, Jones has said he plans to go on a seven–day hunger strike. This will symbolize "the sacrifice needed from Governor Weld to keep the United States on track and stop Buchanan from derailing America's future."

The UMass student claims the Republican Party does not want Buchanan to win the GOP nomination in August. Jones says that Gramm's supporters will head to the Buchanan camp at the Tuesday primary, now that Gramm has withdrawn, therefore making up for the three point lead Dole currently has.

Jones continued to express concern that Bob Dole was not a satisfactory means to

The University of Massachusetts' most famous protester in recent times made news again, this time at a basketball game.

Martin Jones, a journalism major at UMass, sprinted onto the court at the William D. Mullins Center last night at the end of a timeout with a sign that said "Pat Buchanan doesn't care about us" with 7:41 remaining in the No. 1 nationally ranked Minutemen's game with the LaSalle. He was almost immediately tackled by Thorr Bjorn, the associate athletic director in charge of ticket distribution. Bjorn, a former defensive tackle at UMass, and several other officials dragged Jones off the court.

Jones is part of a two–man movement, calling itself the National Committee to Draft Bill Weld for President, which is attempting to convince Massachusetts Governor William Weld to run for the presidency.

Massachusetts coach John Calipari made light of the incident.

"I have to say, the best defensive play of the game, was by Thorr Bjorn," he said, "He didn't make a tackle playing four years here, but he sure learned something. He put down his shoulder, lifted him up and took him down."

Jones ran onto the floor dressed from head to toe in black with the exception of a white mask. According to Joel Stanley, the other member of the pro-Weld organization, Jones had planned a Michael Jackson style dance routine, but didn't get a chance to begin it. Stanley who was carrying a "Bill Weld for President" placard, was also removed from the arena.

Stanley also claimed that Jones had no bail money and would remain in jail during the holiday weekend.

"We were aware of his presence from the beginning of the game," said a Mullins Center official. "We watched him throughout the game, and we were ready for him, when he ran onto the court."

Prior to last night's incident, Jones had reportedly planned to begin a seven-day hunger strike if Buchanan was successful in next week's New Hampshire primary.

Last night was not the first time Jones has created controversy at UMass. He received national attention in spring of 1994 when he led a protest to have UMass' mascot, the Minuteman, banned because it was "too white, too male and too violent."

When the protest fell on deaf ears, Jones began a hunger strike, that ended when UMass Chancellor David K. Scott agreed to open discussion about the topic over lunch at Bertucci's in Amherst.

Six months later Jones changed his position, and dispersed a press release in support of the Minuteman, not only as the UMass mascot, but as a national symbol, and gave a statement on the Massachusetts State House steps.

Ironically, when asked about the mascot controversy, at the time Weld called the protest, "... political correctness run amok."

Weld has repeatedly denied any interest in becoming a candidate for the presidency in the 1996 election.

This is the second time in as many seasons the Massachusetts basketball team has witnessed an on-court protest. Almost exactly a year ago, over 100 Rutgers University students staged a sit down demonstration at halftime on the floor of the Rutgers Athletic Center to protest racially offensive remarks made by Rutgers President Francis Lawrence.

The game was halted, and postponed until a month later, when it was completed in the Philadelphia Spectrum.

In 1961, UNAM built a 40-inch diameter reflecting telescope in Tonantzintla. Astronomer Guillermo Haro helped expand this observatory into a research institution, which became INAOE in 1973.

Today, INAOE has 240 staff members, 75 researchers, 163 masters students and 110 doctoral students. Its annual operating budget is $12 million. Students who qualify to attend INAOE receive full scholarships from the Mexican scientific consul.

The three founding goals of INAOE include research, education and impacting industry. The LMT project is the largest scientific project Mexico has ever undertaken, and is critical for the advancement of astronomy in Mexico.

David Hiriart, a doctoral student at UMass, said the Mexican millimeter radio astronomy community was so small that he knew most of them.

"I hope the LMT will encourage more scientific study," he said. "There are not many millimeter radio astronomers in Mexico."

Highlights of astronomy in Mexico

- Astronomical achievements in Mexico date to ancient civilizations including the Olmec, Zapotec, Mayans, Toltec and Aztecs.
- In 1638, the Universidad de México opened the School of Astrology and Mathematics, the first of its kind in the Americas.
- In 1878 the National Astronomical Observatory was established. Mexico began collaborating with international astronomers.
- In 1938, the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM) created a Faculty of Science. In a few months, the university's Instituto de Astronomía will grant its first doctorate degrees in astrophysics.
- In 1942, an observatory was built in Tonantzintla. In 1973 this became INAOE.
- In 1961, UNAM built a 40-inch diameter great reflecting telescope was built in Tonantzintla.
- In 1950, Mexico had 10 professional astronomers. Mexico now has 80 professional astronomers. Mexico's population is 90 million.

20, 1995 the temperature of the apartment was 60 degrees.

Kibbe offered to pay for tenants without heat to stay in hotels. Nowak and Govoni declined. Catherine Shen, a tenant in another apartment, did take advantage of Kibbe's offer for a few nights.

"We had to eat out every night because there's no kitchen in our hotel room," Shen said. "Also, it was finals week and we had no access to computers, plus we were stuck at Howard Johnson during the snowstorm."

Jill Cisek, Catherine's roommate, testified that Kibbe allegedly told her they were the only ones still experiencing heating problems when they complained again in February. Nowak and Govoni said they were still having problems in February, too.

Anne Kibbe declined to comment as the Collegian went to press. Robert Gatof, president of Essex Partners of Waltham, the company that owns The Boulders, commented on the heating and hot water problems.

"We've been working with Mackins [the company that installed the heating system over the summer] from the minute we got resident no-heat calls," Gatof said, "We don't deny problems in a couple of selected units... Mackins has assured us that the system will be 100 percent perfect over the next several days."

Judge Alvertus Morse, of the Northampton District Court, will rule on the case after both attorneys submit their post- trial memorandums in early March.

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Do you favor providing parents with vouchers to send their children to any participating public, private or religious school?

Bill Clinton

"I support increased options and quality of education through such projects as: charter schools, public school choice and national standards. I also support efforts to increase parents' participation in their children's education, such as: parenting education, parental resource centers and through Education Secretary Riley's parental responsibility campaign. I do not support using public funds to pay for private schools."

Bob Dole

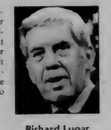
"Yes."

Pat Buchanan

"I believe parental rights are paramount in choosing a child's education. I would favor a voucher system only if no government strings whatsoever are attached."

Lamar Alexander

"Yes. I support the establishment of a $1 billion GI Bill for Kids that would provide scholarships that could be used at any school — public, private or religious — in order to make it easier for middle- and low-income parents to have a choice about where their children go to school."



Richard Lugar

prevent Buchanan from being the Republican candidate. As a senator, Dole's association to Washington limits the amount of support that he could otherwise attract.

Jones claims that Bob Dole will be forced to drop out of the race within the next two weeks due to illness. Should this occur, it would be a "natural transition for Gov. Weld to take Dole's place." Jones however failed to provide any medical evidence on which to base such claims of Dole's health, simply basing his claim on a "gut feeling."

Even so, extending this assumption further, Jones argued that Weld would win the Republican nomination with Dole's former supporters and California Governor Pete Wilson's aid to rally support in his state.

Jones also speculated the prospect of Buchanan creating a third man Presidential race. He said this was the only way Clinton could be assured of a successful re-election. In a two-man race, Jones prophesied that "the Republican nominee will win."

Asked whether he was simply calling on Weld to run for the presidency to counter opposition against the Democrats, Jones said he simply wanted to ensure Americans had access to vote for the right man for the job. He said could easily consider living in an America under Clinton or Weld, but the prospect of a Buchanan America was far from appealing.

The motivation behind Jones' effort is inspired by his concern for the potential damage Whitewater could do to the Clinton administration during the presidential year. More importantly is his desire for Americans to get involved in all stages of the election process — the American public should be able to influence the choice they have in November.

Give him a little bit of credit

"Would you like to apply?" he said on Monday. His line was so rehearsed, so tired, that it was almost unintelligible as it rolled off of his tongue. For all I knew he had said "Would you like a french fry" or "Would you like to get high?" or "Would you like to stroke my creamy white thigh?"

But I knew better. I've learned the hard way to fear the corporate logos of Visa, Mastercard and Discover like a child who is taught to fear drug dealers and clowns who drive dark colored vans with tinted windows.

And for what it's worth, this seedy looking bastard pushing credit cards in the Newman Center might as well have called out "Would you like to get high?" Credit cards have all the positive and negative traits of good drugs. They can you give you a feeling of invincibility that is only rivaled by pure cocaine. They have the ability to give you the feeling of no worries that comes after smoking a fat joint. They can distort your perception of your financial reality like an acid trip.

And in the end, like drugs, credit cards can leave you addicted and broke.

By Wednesday the credit card pusher in the Newman Center had dropped the tired line of "Would you like to apply?" He had resorted to merely standing behind the table playing with a Slinky that was part of the "Free Stuff" AT&T Universal was offering to applicants. Loosely translated, "Free Stuff" means "Worthless crap that is paid for a thousand times over by the inordinate amounts of money YOU will pour into our company."

His sales tactic, though unagressive, was effective. In a 10 minute period I watched five people fill out applications for the card. A conservative estimate would deduce that he had hooked 100 applicants by the end of an eight hour work day.

Some people can manage their credit cards. Others, the less fortunate, spend a good portion of their lives paying off interest, transferring balances from one card to another and trying to get their credit limit raised.

I was a credit card addict. Not too long ago I had two cards maxed-out and a checking account that was overdrawn by close to $3,000. Any money I did earn was used in a futile attempt to pay the minimum monthly payment. Before I knew it, late fees and interest boosts were hitting me from all sides. At the same time I was also getting five to 10 offers a week to open new accounts with other companies.

But boy, oh boy, did I have fun.

It was an instant boost for my lifestyle. Why drink Liquors 44 Gin when you could have Beefeater? Why eat tuna when the Pub was a bus ride away? Why go on listening to the same crap you have when the record store eats plastic?

But the fun ended as suddenly as the emergence of a hangover after a one night stand. A relatively modest bar tab could not be paid when the last credit card slipped over that credit limit. I woke up to the fact that I had an inordinate amount of bills and nothing but crap to show for it.

> "And in the end, like drugs, credit cards can leave you addicted and broke."
> Dave Copeland

When I decided to get my first credit card, it was during the winter break of my sophomore year. Even then, I knew that all I had to do was drive to the closest college campus and I'd find an application for pretty much any credit card company out there. It's not a gamble that these companies take when they set up shop in the Campus Center and plaster their applications on every available bill board. They know college students are A) broke, B) materialistic and C) unable to pay their huge bills off until they are out of school.

With spring break approaching, the credit card companies are scoring big. The other night I overheard a conversation that was fueled partially by ignorance and partially by a strong desire to not be left in Amherst come mid-March.

"I keep telling all of my friends to get off their asses and get credit cards so they can charge their spring breaks."

With a friend like that, wishing upon you the potential evils of inescapable financial hardship, do you really need enemies?

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

How bad are Five-College students getting screwed by the PVTA financial set up? Let's see... students, through their fees, almost completely finance the bus system's entire existence.

A minimal percentage of Amherst taxes go toward the PVTA but the towns of Sunderland, Belchertown, Northampton, etc don't pay a cent.

Ridiculous. These people use the buses just as much as students, but we get stuck with the bill! How about $.50 a ride for anyone without a student ID?

There's no need for our money to finance transportation for the townies.

Has anyone seen Billy Bulger anywhere on campus except at a basketball game?

If you look in front of the visitors bench at the William D. Mullins Center hockey rink, you will see "T.R. 24" painted underneath the ice. "T.R." is the initials of Travis Roy, the Boston University hockey player who was paralyzed earlier this season. The Mullins Center operations crew decided at the beginning of the season to keep the injured Terrier in the thoughts of players and fans that attend UMass games with the subtle tribute.

The Mullins crew, as well as the many all over the country that have done their part to help Roy, deserve to be applauded.

Staying with the Mullins Center theme, is it me or are there some missing hoop banners? While the absence of last year's Atlantic 10 and NCAA is annoying, the absence of Lou Roe's retired No. 15 jersey is a slap in the face. They should have brought him in for the Temple game, while he was on his NBA All-Star break.

I wonder, if he had worn No. 32, would his jersey be up there?

Hmmm...

The nine most dreaded words to every college student at the beginning of the semester:

"The section you have requested could not be processed."

Any amount of forethought would have brought most people to the conclusion that there would be a lot of patrons going to restaurants after the UMass–Temple game. So... Buy more food to compensate. Right? Somebody forgot to tell that to the owners of the Pub.

Sunday night the Pub had no wings, fries or hamburg. Missing one of those, might be acceptable, but fries, wings, and burgers are staples of bar food! Mistakes happen but if you're not going to warn patrons ahead of time, then maybe a discount or a gift certificate would be nice to customers that showed up hoping for the traditional burger and fries.

Letters to the Editor and Columns

Attention all columnists: If you haven't yet, please come down this week to get your picture taken. Questions? Call Bob.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please type your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

Letters to the Editor can also be sent through our e- mail account: letters@oit.vms.oit.umass.edu

The Ed/Op page is also always looking for columnists. If you are interested in writing columns for the Collegian, come down to the office, or call at 545-1491, and ask to speak to Bob Dunn.

Making the game

So you think covering the number one team in the nation is fun, huh? Sure it's great to sit on press row at the William D. Mullins center. It's an honor to give the play by play or color commentary over the radio and it's exciting to meet great coaches and players after the game. But the best part about working as student media is the road trip.

Being a part of student media will get you into the games, but that's about it. When we travel on the road, whether it be to Maryland, Philadelphia or Virginia, we truly rough it — sometimes traveling with six people in a Ford Tempo and sometimes staying in a tiny hotel room with five or six other bodies.

Just a few weeks back, I covered the St. Joe's game down in Philadelphia. It was over winter break, and the Collegian was not active, so only myself and a man we'll call Greg went down. Two men and seven hours of driving, what could go wrong?

Everything was fine until we hit New York. Wanting to make good time, I didn't see anything wrong with going a little fast. Obviously, the man driving the car with the flashing blue lights behind me felt a little differently.

As the officer approached my car I suddenly got a case of the giggles. I rolled down my window and heard those famous words, "license and registration please." He looked over the registration and asked if the car was rented. Trying to be funny but miserably failing at doing so I replied, "yes officer. I would never buy a car that is metallic blue." I sort of giggled and he sort of got angry. "Can you please step out of the car please," he barked. As I hopped out the first thing I noticed was the cop's name tag. His name was officer Popadick. Now I understood why he was so angry. With a name like Popadick he must have had a rough childhood.

Officer Popadick gave me a lecture and advised me not to drive at 81 mph in a 55 mph zone. He then said, "If you don't slow down I'll have to give you a summons." I told him I would watch the speeding and respect the rules of the road. Officer Popadick suddenly turned into Mr. Popanice and let me go. I got back into the car and realized that we were now behind schedule. I'll spare you the stories of the three times we got lost and fast forward you to Trenton, New Jersey at 3:45 p.m.

I looked at the gas gauge and decided it was time to fuel up. We pulled into a Mobil rest stop and I volunteered to pump the petrol. I got out of the car and approached the attendant's window to pre-pay. When I got to the window a man whose name was Olaf barked, "seven dollars." I told him that I didn't pump any gas yet and that I wanted to pay first. Olaf then went into a fit. "If you do not pay for gas, I will call the police." I quickly pulled rank and replied, "Big deal, I know officer Popadick." We argued until a little woman came up and said, "Here is $7 for pump #2." Olaf did not apologize, he just gave me the "Dirty Harry" stare. Before hitting the road again I ran into the McDonald's next door to use the bathroom.

As I walked towards the rest room I saw a man wearing a Skid Row t-shirt, acid washed jeans and a fluorescent teal bandanna tied around his head. For clarity I'll name him Gabe. I walked into the bathroom and no one was in there. There were about thirty urinals so I went down to number 12 and started to relieve myself. Wouldn't you know it a few seconds later, Gabe entered.

Gabe had the choice of 29 other urinals but he decided to pull up next to me. Gabe looked at me and said, "Hey, where are you headed?" Still annoyed with Olaf and the Mobil situation I yelled, "Can you please not talk to me?" It's bad enough that Gabe violated one of the cardinal rules of manhood (talking to another man at the urinal), but after I told him to get lost he kept on yapping. Finally, I finished and in fear of either Gabe killing me or I killing Gabe, I darted from bathroom to car in 2.3 seconds.

Back on the highway we got lost only once more because a man named Tony at the toll both decided to send us to Villanova instead of St. Joe's. After a one-hour detour we were back on track and in major traffic somewhere in the center of Philadelphia at 5:45 p.m. We were now starting to worry. We had hoped to be at the game by 5:30 so we could set up and plan our pre-game introduction. Already 15 minutes late, and we still had a few miles to cover.

Before we knew it, the clock read 6:40 and we still were not there. On the radio we could hear a local station airing their pre-game. We were about half a mile away from the gym at Hawk Hill. We started to panic. It was time for Brad D to turn into Turbo Brad D! I quickly blew through three red lights, took a left down a one way street and in a jiffy we were there.

I quickly parked illegally, grabbed our equipment and ran inside. We picked up our press passes and while Greg set up the gear, I changed into a shirt and tie in the nearest rest room. Finally changed, I ran to our seats to see Greg sweating like it was August. The people at Hawk Hill forgot to give us an outlet to plug in our equipment. Luckily enough the friendly station next to us had an extra so they let us hook in. We were now all set to go.

The time was 6:58 and without any pre-game talk without even looking at the line-ups for either teams, people all around the pioneer valley could hear, "Hello my name is Greg Corey along with Brad Davidson. We'll be bringing you tonight's match up of the University of Massachusetts Minutemen vs. the Hawks of St. Joe's. You're tuned into WMUA 91.1, your source for UMass sports."

Brad Davidson is a Collegian staff member.

It isn't just quackery

When I was younger, I used to go to the duck pond quite often and feed them bits of bread. For some reason, I really enjoyed it. A few years ago, a friend of mine asked me to participate in a duck decoy auction; that is, I would be one to handle and display certain wooden ducks valuing upwards of $20,000. Now I attend an institute of higher education that boasts more than a wealth of resource and opportunity, a window to world awareness and a place of social contentment. Indeed, I have the fortune of studying and residing in a haven for ducks.

Maybe I've never heard ducks before. Maybe I never noticed them communicate. Maybe I never cared. It's either that or another strange Amherst mutation (recall the black squirrels) that has brought to my center for intellectual development a huge posse of cackling ducks. The first night I heard one I actually thought it was some wiseguy mocking our feathery friends by the campus pond. I soon learned that this was not the case, and that our special gathering of ducks is actually a bunch of old cigar-smoking, knee-slapping, gin players who spend the night wheezing, complaining about gas prices and comparing yogurt flavors in their microcosmic duck world. My theory is that the body of "water" in which they're most frequently found is in fact 150 proof, thanks to the influence (not to mention the excretions) of countless UMass students over the years. We've successfully cultivated a pond of piss and beer, folks. I sometimes fear that I'm the only one who has noticed this because most of my friends think I'm insane. One might notice me involuntarily burst into fitful laughter during a stroll by the pond. I'd control myself if I could, really.

The cool thing that I discovered about these ducks as I walked back from a night class thoroughly depressed and on the verge of tears is that just when life seems to really stink, that familiar cackle will fill the night air, reverberate off your eardrum, and send a neurological impulse to your brain, demanding an upward motion of the corners of your mouth. Just when things seem really bad,... "QUACK ACK AC AC ACK!" You can't not smile! I'm not one who is easily cheered either. I'm so happy that ducks exist right now that I don't even mind if no one cares! Their inherent joy is spreading to me, I think. Maybe I was meant to be quacking away in -30 degree weather, poking fun at all those human busy-bodies scooting around to their various "appointments."

Please don't think that I view ducks as the solution to our corrupt world or anything. I'm certainly not suggesting that a life of quacking and eating stale bread is more fulfilling and meaningful than our lives as people in society. I'm just thankful for our ducks. Take a look at our vibrant community out there sometime. Better yet, listen to them. Go ahead and laugh. If you'd like, I'll be there right next to you, if that's any consolation (and even if it isn't). Then, if one night you think you hear a pervading quack bearing little resemblance to that of a duck and more to that of a drunk UMass student, that would be me, on the lawn, most likely free of intoxication, spending the evening with some old pals.

Jesse Pietroniro is a UMass student.

The Ramones put on great show

By Mike Burke

RAMONES
Pearl Street
Feb. 13

One, Two, Three, Four... and the Ramones were off. Punk's elderstatesmen, the leather clad Ramones tore into Pearl Street with their lightning fast blitzkrieg punk tunes setting the sold-out crowd on smoke. The crowd danced (and drank) as if this was the last rock show ever as the Ramones put on a stellar performance performing old classics to their recent MTV smash.

The club's atmosphere resembled one more of a crowded keg party with lots of smelly drunk guys pushing their way through the crowd so they could get another cup of Budweiser. But through this all, the Ramones just blew away the rest of the crowd with their well-oiled punk rock formula. (Thanks go out to all you kind folks who spilled beer over my sweater and pants, I appreciated the free beer.)

Led by Joey Ramones on lead vocals, the band ripped through their immensely deep catalog often only stopping between songs to scream, "One. Two. Three. Four" and the next song was on (and already almost over.) The songs were short, catchy and nearly all sounded the same, but that is alright because this is the Ramones — not Rush.

Old hits such as "Sheena Is A Punk Rocker" and "The KKK Stole My Baby Away" flowed flawlessly side by side with new hits like "I Don't Wanna Grow Up," which could stand as the band's theme song. As for stage presence, what more do you need than seeing Joey raise his microphone stand about his head and scream after half the songs? With his leather jacket, long black hair and sunglasses, Joey looked more the part of a '80s arena rock superstars like Tesla.

This was billed as one of the Ramones last shows but as the band showed last night, it looks like they are having too much fun to give up. The band may not be on the cutting edge like it was 20 years ago but they still put on a fantastic live show. Hey ho, let's go!

Red hot release captures local sound

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

1996 hasn't been the best of years for local music, especially with the virtual shut down of the area's premier local music club, the Bay State Cabaret. But this Saturday the scene will be as alive as ever as Nohopolloza hits the Grotto at the Red Hot cassette release party. Eight of the best local bands are teaming up for a night that will go down in local music legend.

The eight band mega-show is in collaboration with the release of the Live In the Living Room cassette compilation on Red Hot Records, a new label run by Aimee Swift and Amy Greene, both of Pirate Jenny. The new cassette is the third Red Hot release, after a Pirate Jenny cassette and 7" single.

Live In the Living Room features 12 local bands all of whom recorded one song each in Swift and Greene's living room last December. Eight of these bands will take the stage this Saturday night. According to Swift, the cassette was put together as an inexpensive way to spotlight the local scene. More releases such as this one are expected in the future.

Not since the release of Chunk's Hotel Massachusetts compilation in 1993 has one release so well captured the sound and essence of the local scene. Saturday night's show should be an ideal way of catching up any local music that you may have missed.

Among the many live highlights are University of Massachusetts' own the Mitchells, who recently performed an impressive hour-long set in Butterfield last weekend. Other artists performing are Tizzy, Pirate Jenny, Pangloss, Stringbean, Encyclopedia Brown, Diana Davis and the Ray Mason Band.

The Red Hot Release Party takes place at the Grotto in Northampton Saturday Feb. 17. Tickets are $4 and available at the door. The show is 18+. Call the club at 586-6900 for more information.

Film for Life festival continues today

By Seema Gangahrkar
Collegian Staff

The second Film for Life festival continues Saturday with three diverse programs with something for everyone. The festival will be presented in Sage Hall at Smith College beginning at 3:30 p.m.

The Afternoon Show at 3:30 p.m. features five films directed by women. Local filmmaker Judith LeBold's short experimental film titled House Search, recalls childhood rituals and mixed emotions about her father. The Kitchen Blues by Charlene Gilbert focuses on African-American culture, history and the tradition of hair braiding. Mary Kocol's photo-animation, Is This Me? uses family photographs to help reconstruct family and personal history. Two other films, Castor Oil Can Do That and Playing the Part, will also be shown.

The Dusk Show begins at 6 p.m. with tributes to family and friends with evocative portraits. Acclaimed experimental filmmaker Leslie Thornton's moving tribute, The Last Time I Saw Ron, is a life-affirming and visually stunning tribute to actor Ron Vawter who died of AIDS. Finally, William Rogers paints an uplifting portrait of Joe, a mildly retarded man in My Uncle Joe.

Film for Life culminates at 8 p.m. with a diverse mix of seven favorites sure to please the audience. Highlights of this screening include Portrait of Boy with Dog, We Will Life Forever, Vanessa the Orange Thrower and 730 Grove Street. Following this show will be a party at the Green Street Cafe.

Tickets are $5 each for the 3:30 p.m. and 6 p.m. and $12 for the 8 p.m. show and the party at the Green Street Cafe. $20 provides admission to all Saturday events. A festival pass is available for $25 and includes admission to Friday and Saturday events. For more information, please call (413) 256-1260. Call 1-800-TIXE-TICK or (413) 586-8686 for tickets.

Jazz band to hit Iron Horse

By Matt Wexler
Collegian Staff

On Feb. 19, The Caribbean Jazz Project will be bringing its mix of island sounds, jazz and pop to the Iron Horse in Northampton. The band is relatively new to the jazz scene, but it's mainstream players are no strangers to the music.

The Caribbean Jazz project came into being with its public debut in 1993 at Central Park in New York City when vibraphonist Dave Samuels was asked to put together a special group of musicians.

Samuels made some phone calls to get the band together, and after several gigs, The Caribbean Jazz Project got signed to Heads Up International to record their first album.

Publicly the best known musician in the group is Samuels, due to his long stint with saxophonist Jay Beckenstein's fusion/pop/jazz group, Spyro Gyra. Samuels uses the vibraphone not only as a melodic instrument, but explores the percussive and rhythmic aspects as well.

Paquito D'Rivera is the saxman and clarinetist of the group, and hails from Cuba. His is a major influence in the tropics fell of the band's compositions, backing up tunes with jumpy solos and bright woodwind sounds.

He sports an extensive background with Latin and Cuban music, and has played with several of the larger legends in jazz, most notably the late great Dizzy Gillespie.

Finally we come to the third member of the band's stars, a steel drum player named Andy Narell. He was chosen by Samuel's for his aggressive style. The steel drum does the band's name justice, adding a definitive Caribbean feel that is merely hinted at by Samuel's vibe playing. The Caribbean Jazz Project also employs Oscar Stagnaro on bass, Dario Eskenazi on piano, Mark Walker on the drums and Luis Conte playing auxiliary percussion.

The Caribbean Jazz Project isn't a terribly hard hitting jazz group; instead, their music follows the worn path set by Spyro Gyra's giddy pop compositions. The band does an excellent job creating the soft tropical image it strives for, but their tunes also tend to have definite jazz influences, with snappy improvisations and aggressive playing.

If judged by their album, the music may be considered uninspired, but given time the band distinguishes itself from others that it closely resembles as the star talent does shine through in the solos and complex melodies. The Caribbean Jazz Project is expected to put on an excellent show, exploring all aspects of their multicultured music.

Women's tennis starts season

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

With its 9-1 fall season record under its belt, the Massachusetts women's tennis team is looking to continue that dominance in the spring, as it will face Ivy League opponent Yale today in New Haven, Conn.

The Minutewomen participated in the Cornell Invitational Feb. 3-4, just two days after they began practicing again. The Invitational was a tournament format with four different brackets for singles, and two for doubles.

Cornell, is a nationally ranked team which didn't give UMass a chance to ease into the spring season. It was mostly a preparation match, which head coach Judy Dixon felt was important.

"The competition is what we need," Dixon said. "This tournament is a way for me to see where we are. This tournament was not about results, this tournament was about where we are, and we came out of it seeing what we really need to work on."

UMass was second best in the match behind Cornell, against other competitors Fairfield, St. Bonaventure, SUNY-Buffalo, and Vermont.

No. 1 singles player Liesl Sitton lost in the finals of the A Singles tournament 6-2, 6-3, and No. 2 player Caroline Steele lost in the semi-finals, both to eventual winner Olga Itskhaki of Cornell.

In the B singles it was freshman Jackie Braunstein, and junior Elizabeth Durant competing for the Minutewomen. Braunstein lost in the first round, while Durant made it to the semi-finals.

Sophomore Lana Goredetskaya was out in the first round of the C division, and sophomore Marie-Christine Caron made it to the semi-finals.

In the D bracket sophomore Noelle Orsini played very well as she came out with the victory, while teammate Melissa Parsons made it to the quarterfinals.

In the A doubles the duo of Sitton and Steele made it to the semi's while Braunstein and Durant were knocked out in the first round. The B doubles bracket saw Goredetskaya and Caron make it to the finals and Orsini and Parsons were defeated in the quarterfinals, both teams losing to eventual winner Cornell.

Today the Minutewomen will tackle Yale in their first match of the second half of the season. Other than the Cornell tournament, the Minutewomen have been out of action since October.

"We've never played a division one Ivy League program since I've been here," Dixon said. "Some of the teams [In the Ivy League] are the class of Division I tennis in New England."

Dixon feels that the competition is just what the Minutewomen need.

"We're now competing against nationally ranked programs, and two years ago that was unheard of," Dixon said. "So we need to take that next step."

Ironically, Dixon will be heading back to the courts where she coached Yale 25 years ago.

"Yale has always had a very strong program," Dixon said. "Their athletes are well trained, they have an indoor facility, they practice hard all year round, and because it's an Ivy League school these are kids who've had tennis training their whole lives. My expectation is that they're going to be deep."

The Minutewomen has a team composed of 10 players, six of whom are sophomores and two freshman. However, Dixon has confidence and feels that most people are ready to play.

"I feel that our team is exceptionally deep," Dixon said. "I think what makes this team so good is that we have the supporting cast to take us all the way down.

"This team plays on emotion and plays on intensity," Dixon said. "If we have it we're going to do well. If we come out flat against Yale, or if we come out with less confidence then we won't do well."

During the fall season the Minutewomen had only a couple of close matches and it was St. John's which they defeated 4-3, and Rutgers giving them their only loss, 5-4 considering all we've been through this year," said Yarworth, referring to the untimely death of junior Greg Menton.

Unfortunately, Mujica is in Mexico and was unable to attend the ceremony.

The honors received by Limardo and Mujica certainly lighten the off-season burden dropped on the shoulders of Yarworth and the entire men's swimming and water polo department.

The death of Greg Menton was a huge blow to both teams and the campus community as a whole. Menton was the water polo team's fastest swimmer and one of the squad's most consistent scorers. Menton ranks second in career shooting percentage and is in the top ten in three other categories. He is also a multiple record holder on the currently undefeated men's swimming team.

The loss of Menton is still being felt, and will be for a while to come. The naming of Limardo and Mujica to the All-America team will hopefully serve as a distraction for Yarworth and his team.

No. 1 ranking and blew the doors off LaSalle and the smile off Morris' face, winning, going away, 70-55.

This however is not the first time a team that isn't that good has hung around with UMass into the second half. Against Fordham the Minutemen went to the break up only one, and they were down 11 to Xavier at halftime. Playing down to their opponents isn't a concern of the players or their coach.

"I know even when we're down," Marcus Camby said, "that we are going to come back. It's kind of sad but I feel that no matter what, we are going to make a run and catch up and win."

Camby's coach isn't worried about how they won tonight's game, because of how he feels his team rises to every occasion.

"We won, so I'm happy," coach John Calipari said. "I don't care what anyone says, it's hard to get them going. It doesn't matter what you do. When we were at Fordham everybody thought I yelled and screamed but I didn't, I laughed.

"Every big game that we've played, we've played big."

All year the question has been asked if they are going to tire. It can be asked two-fold with the extra energy exerted tonight by Minutemen starters Camby (35 minutes) Carmelo Travieso (36) and Edgar Padilla (37). Will this effect the Minutemen's performance Saturday with No. 10 Virginia Tech?

"I'd much rather play, then practice," Camby said.

"They'll be ready," Calipari added.

Travieso," Duquesne coach Scott Edgar said. "Obviously Camby and Custis will be the two players talked about most, but a lot depends on the backcourt and shooting guards."

Xavier coach Skip Prosser feels the game could come down to how well the forwards play.

"I think guys like Shawn Smith, Shawn Good, Donta Bright and Dana Dingle, those are the ones who I think are real barometers for their teams. I think they will really determine the outcome of that game," Prosser said.

Co-captains Bright and Dingle have been playing solid basketball for the Minutemen lately, as have the two guards, Travieso and Padilla, and of course, Camby. Whatever the game comes down to, most agree it is going to be a classic. "I think that it is really going to be a great matchup," Prosser said. "Both are very strong-willed teams. Virginia Tech has a little bit more experience, starting four seniors, and they will be at home, so that is a positive. But no one in the country has more will than Massachusetts. It'll be a tremendous battle of wills and determination. It's going to be a classic, a war."

"I'm going to certainly watch the basketball game, I'll be a fan," Edgar said. "It will be a great day for college basketball. Two great teams will be playing each other. It's a great A-10 game."

tributing a goal and three assists to UMass' Alumni Cup-winning game against rival UMass-Lowell.

More play like this will be needed from both Norris and his teammates if the UNH jinx is to be broken this weekend. Wins are important for UMass as an eighth place finish will likely send the team to defending champion BU's Walter Brown Arena in the first round of the playoffs. The seventh place team, will likely face the River Hawks, a team UMass has a great deal of confidence playing against.

"Every weekend there's 10 points on the line," Mallen said. "If we can get 10 points out of this weekend, we move into seventh place, and then you look at catching Northeastern or BC. With 10 points this weekend that could all be possible."

Massachusetts track has A-10s in reach

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's indoor track and field squad will look to win its first ever Atlantic 10 Conference Championship this Saturday at Mackal Field House in Rhode Island.

The Minutemen, finishing the regular season at 13-7, are figured to end up as one of the top four teams at the meet, and with a strong performance in the sprints and middle distance events could conceivably win the championship.

"We feel as though we have a legitimate chance to win the meet," coach Ken O'Brien said. "We'll need to be operating on all eight cylinders. It's a tough challenge, but well within our grasp."

In nearly every meet, UMass has scored consistently deep in the jumping and throwing events. In accordance to their strength, O'Brien has entered three athletes each in the long jump, triple jump and shot put.

"If you look at the key combatants in the team aspect, I think we hold an edge in the jumps and the throws over Virginia Tech, St. Joseph's and LaSalle," he said.

In the long jump, Carlos Peralta has posted the second-best A-10 leap this season and is joined with Melvin Harris and Raphael Williams of Va. Tech, and Jere Link of URI a good four feet behind the best jump of Temple's Jon Weathers. Eugene LaFlamme and Alex Ampontuah will also compete in this event.

Andre Roach has a definite shot at collecting six points in the triple jump as he and Rob Lee (URI) notched virtually the same season-best jump. Lee's best leap was a scant half inch further than Roach's. A freshman out of Springfield, Roach will be joined by Ampontuah and Brandon Tutt, who finished fourth in the A-10 last season.

The shot put is all Minutemen, with captain Marc LeFebvre favored to win the event and freshman Ian Stevens well in place to take either second or third.

The three relay races will also be key to Massachusetts' success. O'Brien has again mixed up the teams in order to ensure that the athletes have fresh legs at the end of the meet when the relays are run.

In the 4x800m relay, UMass has the upper hand, posting the best regular season time, a full two and a half seconds better than the Fordham foursome.

"If [the meet] went down to the last leg of the last relay, I'd be ecstatic," said O'Brien, referring to the results of the URI-UNH meet.

If a situation like that were to come about the Minutemen would be in good shape. The last race is the distance medley relay, and the Massachusetts quartet has a time just one second under the best time posted by St. Joseph's.

UMass downs LaSalle, ready for A-10 showdown

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Political protesters were not the only ones jumping out of their seats in the Massachusetts men's basketball game against LaSalle last night. A flat first half for the Minutemen had fans on the edge of their seats.

The first 10 minutes of the opening stanza seemed to be going well toward the Minutemen's 70-53 win. Just under five minutes into the game, Donta Bright (19 points, five rebounds) found Marcus Camby (26 points, 15 rebounds) inside for the jam as the Minutemen (24-0, 12-0 in the Atlantic 10) took an 8-5 lead. With 10:27 to go in the half, UMass had a handle on a 10-point advantage when Tyrone Weeks made the layup off a dish from Bright.

The Explorers (5-19, 2-9 in the A-10), however, were up for the game and thought nothing of the raucous Mullins Center crowd as they battled back with an 8-0 run to knot the score at 18 on a Olof Landgren layup. The Minutemen would only light up two more points on the board as the Explorers went on an 8-0 run to close out the half with a 28-20 advantage.

The first half was marred by a UMass squad that could not shoot from the outside, going 0-3 from three-point land. Outside shooting ace Carmello Travieso (4 points) went 1-4 from the field and 0-2 from outside the arc. Even more surprising were the 15 turnovers UMass committed in the first half.

"It was the first time we had seen a zone that wide," said UMass coach John Calipari. "What they were saying was 'take the lane and we're not giving you the corner passes' and that confused us at first."

After an initial jumper by Everett Catlin gave LaSalle a 30-20 advantage, UMass kicked off an 11-0 run ending with a roar from the crowd when Camby slammed down a missed Travieso trey just under three minutes into the second half, giving the Minutemen a one point lead.

With 15 minutes remaining in the game, Shawn Smith sank a 10-foot jumper putting LaSalle up 40-38, its last lead of the evening. Padilla followed with an easy layup, tying the score at 40 before the Minutemen would go on a 19-4 run putting UMass up 59-44.

With 7:41 to go in the game, Calipari was issued a technical foul after protesting a Padilla foul on Smith just before Mike Gizzi (15 points) stepped up to the charity stripe, mayhem struck the Mullins Center.

Apparently, one crazed Republican fan in the stands couldn't wait until the New Hampshire primary to offer his support, as he raced incognito across the court with a Bill Weld poster. Mullins Center officials were able to apprehend the man and escort him from the building.

UMass never looked back as it ran away with the win, with both Camby and Bright finishing the evening with double-doubles.

"We won. In the second half, we did what we had to do to win," Calipari said, despite his team's flat start.

Directly after the 17-point win, UMass left for Blacksburg, Va. where the Minutemen will face one of their toughest conference match-ups this season on Saturday with No. 10 Virginia Tech.

"We got the win and that's what counts," Dingle said. "Now we have to get ready for Virginia Tech, this game is behind us now, it's over."

UM ready for Va. Tech

The old adage says you should take it one game at a time. After Virginia Tech's 96-53 scare with college basketball powerhouse Liberty, LaSalle's men's basketball coach William "Speedy" Morris let his team know anything was possible, i.e. knocking off the unbeaten University of Massachusetts.

The Hokies were looking ahead to Saturday's match-up with the top ranked Minutemen and the Explorers were hoping for a similar situation.

They almost got it.

In the first half, UMass was very tentative, made several turnovers and its defensive intensity was not what it normally is. Shots that had been going down for the team in its run to 24-0 just weren't. And after closing out the first half with an 18-2 run, Morris was smiling as his team went to the locker room up eight points.

"I would imagine that John [Calipari] was not happy with his team performance in the first half," Morris said. "But there's 40 minutes to a basketball game."

The Minutemen came out in the second half looking more like their

Star players to square off

Besides Massachusetts-Temple, this is the Atlantic 10 game that many people have been looking forward to — Massachusetts-Virginia Tech.

At the start of season, the Hokies were seen as the main team that would give the Minutemen a challenge for the A-10 title. The Hokies entered the 1995-96 season as the defending National Invitational Tournament Champions, and returned all five starters.

This season, the No. 10 Hokies record hasn't disappointed, as they are 19-2, 10-1 in the A-10, and have been ranked as high as No. 8.

However, their schedule hasn't been very tough. Some of Virginia Tech's wins have come against such teams as Coastal Carolina, William & Mary, Virginia Military, UNC-Greensboro and Liberty. Against Liberty the Hokies struggled and won by only three points. Their two losses have come against George Washington and Georgia.

Ace Custis is the main man for Virginia Tech as the junior is averaging a team-high 14.2 points and a team-high 9.9 rebounds per game. Damon Watlington (13.6 ppg), Travis Jackson (8.7 ppg), Shawn Smith (11.4) and Shawn Good (7.3 ppg) round out the Hokies' starting lineup.

"I'm sure they're going to give us a great game. Bill Foster's a great basketball coach. It's going to be a fun game and it's going to be exciting," Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "We're looking forward to going down there. It may be a very tough game for us to win. If they beat us, they beat us. If we win, we'll be happy."

While the focus will be on the two stars, UMass' Marcus Camby and Custis, most A-10 coaches feel the game will come down to the play of the backcourt.

"A lot will be determined on who shoots the ball better, either [Damon] Watlington or Carmelo

Hockey hopes to end Wildcat jinx

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Before the start of this season, Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen stated that one of his goals for the season was to beat each Hockey East opponent at least once.

UMass (10-16-2, 4-13-2 in Hockey East) will get its second and third cracks at New Hampshire (10-15-2, 6-11-2) this weekend as the two teams face off in a home and home series.

Friday night the Wildcats will venture to the Pioneer Valley for a 7 p.m. game at the Mullins Center, and Saturday the Minutemen will make a return trip to the new Whittemore Center, where they fell 7-2 two weeks ago.

While the records might indicate that this series will feature two evenly matched teams, this has not been the case when the Minutemen have tangled with the Wildcats.

UNH, an NCAA tournament team last year, has always presented problems for the Minutemen in regards to matchups. Wildcat coach Dick Umile has always had a speedy team which has given UMass fits both at Mullins and Whittemore, the league's only two Olympic-sized ice surfaces. The large ice surfaces amplify the discrepancy in team speed in favor of UNH.

Mark Mowers, Eric Nickulas and other UNH forwards have not been well contained by the UMass defense in the teams' previous four meetings since the reinstatement of the program. The sole exception being a 6-3 game last year at Manchester, NH's undersized JFK Coliseum, where UNH played while its new home was under construction.

The Wildcats looked sharp, despite falling 6-5 in overtime on NESN Sunday. This time it was Eric Boguniecki who did the offensive damage for UNH, netting a Texas hat-trick in the contest. While depth has been a problem for the Wildcats, their top forwards are as solid as any team's.

"The key to UNH is that they're loaded up front and get a lot of scoring out of their top two lines," Mallen said. "We have to find a way to shut down those key guys."

Who will mind either net is an issue. Brian Regan felt sick all day on Tuesday, and is questionable for tonight's game, but will likely get the starting nod if healthy. UNH's Brian Larochelle and Trent Cavicchi have split time fairly evenly of late, and either could see time this weekend against the Minutemen.

Larochelle, also a pro prospect as a catcher for the Wildcat baseball team, was in the net as UNH downed UMass on Feb. 3. The sophomore out of Phillips Exeter, just 15 minutes from Durham, was particularly sharp with his glove, which robbed several quality UMass scoring opportunities.

"We've got to solve their goaltending," captain Jaynen Rissling said. "They've come up big against us. We solved the problem with Merrimack and hopefully we can do the same with UNH."

The Minutemen have been playing solidly of late, although it is not necessarily reflected in their 1-2-1 mark since returning to classes. The Minutemen ran over Merrimack, solidifying their playoff position, and played a solid 4-1 game at Boston University on Friday night, just three days before BU obliterated Northeastern 11-4 in the Beanpot championship game.

The only game in this stretch where UMass clearly was off their game was their encounter with the Wildcats.

Warren Norris had a strong weekend that earned him recognition as an honorable mention for Hockey East Player of the Week. Norris had a hand in all five UMass goals this past weekend, con-

Minutewomen head to New York to take on Rams; prepare for Atlantic 10s

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team takes to the road this weekend, kicking off a three-game road trip when it travels to New York to face Fordham on Sunday.

The Minutewomen (16-7, 8-4 in the Atlantic 10) are in the midst of their biggest winning streak of the season, with victories in the last four contests. Perhaps that is due to the magic of the William D. Mullins Center, as the squad is undefeated in matches played there this year, and has not lost in its home arena since last February.

The last time the Minutewomen met the Lady Rams (8-13, 2-8 in the A-10), they were on the winning end of a 72-50 blowout which kicked off their flawless four game homestand.

Fordham beware: the UMass offensive threat is at its best right now. If the Lady Rams can't step up the defense, something they didn't do in their trip to Amherst, they are in trouble.

In Wednesday night's win over Duquesne, senior co-captains Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile led the way for the Minutewomen each posting double-doubles, with Thomas recording a season-high 27-point performance.

The two captains, combined with the inside-outside scoring combo of Crystal Carrol and Beth Kuzmeski resulted in an amazing 28-2 run to close out the game against the Lady Dukes.

UMass is also playing 10 players deep right now, with a solid bench highlighted by exceptional freshman play. Jaywana Bradley has led the rookies getting the start for two out of the four home games, averaging 20 minutes per game and 8.3 ppg. Yolanda Rayside and Lucia Madajova have put in some quality rebounding minutes as well.

The struggling Rams are led by Suzanne Maguire, averaging 14.4 ppg and Alayna Jankunis, 11.6 ppg. The Rams have lost their last nine straight games.

The road trip will be good for UMass as it looks to prepare for a trip to Blacksburg, Va., home of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. It is one thing to win four games in a row in your home gym, pulling out key victories on the road is another matter, especially in post-season play.

"We're just going to take it one game at a time," said Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien. "It's a road trip, but as a matter of fact, it might be good to get out of here for a little while. We've been in Amherst for two weeks and four games, we'll just take it one game at a time and see what happens."

At the end of the Minutewomen's road trip is the last regular season match against Rhode Island, a team that beat UMass earlier in the season, and which currently sits in first place in the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division.

Limardo, Mujica receive honors

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.

A near-perfect ending to a near-perfect season.

Culminating the best campaign in the annals of UMass water polo history — a 28-7 record, a third consecutive Eastern Championship, an NCAA Final Four appearance and the best finish of any Eastern water polo team ever — seniors Luis Limardo and Alex Mujica were named to the United States Water Polo Coaches Association All-America team.

Limardo (third team) and Mujica (honorable mention) are the third and fourth Minutemen ever to be named to the All- America team. Tasan Engin, who is in the top 10 in nine career categories, was named to the third team in 1993. Last season, Javier Gonzalez was named an honorable mention All-American after setting the all-time Massachusetts career mark for goals scored, only to have it broken this year by Limardo.

"I think it shows that our program is now being perceived as a program that produces and attracts national calibre athletes," said two-time Eastern Coach of the Year Russ Yarworth. "It makes me feel good. It's a nice tribute to these kids for working so hard."

A native of Guaynabo, Puerto Rico, Limardo finished his career with 306 goals and 402 points. This season, he served as a co-captain with John Luviano and led the squad with 141 points along with being named to the All-Eastern team for the second year in a row. Also in 1995, Limardo was named the Eastern Player of the Year as well as being named to the NCAA All-Tournament team.

"Luis proved that he's one of the better two-meter men in the country and Alex did the same in the goal," Yarworth said.

Mujica, a four-year starter in goal for the Minutemen, ranks as the team's all-time leader in saves (743) and steals (187). The native of Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico stands second in career save percentage posting a four-year mark of .560. He is also number two in UMass history in goals against average (7.50).

Mujica was named to the All-Eastern team the past three years as well as earning a spot on the All-New England team in 1992 and 1993.

The two were honored at half time of the men's basketball game against LaSalle last night.

"It's a nice thing to have happen

Softball begins this weekend

The Massachusetts softball team kicks off its 1996 campaign at the Coca-Cola Classic in Tempe, Ariz. at Arizona State University. Today's opener pits the UMass against Oregon.

The Minutewomen will take on the Ducks at 10 a.m. and will face No. 2 Arizona State at 6 p.m. in their second game of the day.

The team will take part in three games on Saturday, facing Ohio State at noon, Arizona at 4 p.m. and Utah State at 6 p.m. UMass will conclude the weekend with an 11 a.m. game with New Mexico State.

The 1996 Official Spring Break Guide — American Passage

For Beach Junkies ONLY!

by Paula Nechak

Imagine this. You're months away from cavorting on the beach in Florida. Your skin is a whiter shade of pale. Your roommate is layering and wearing a down parka. The thought of white-sand beaches, the sun reflecting on the little bitty particles of bleached shoreline makes you instinctively reach for your shades. But, your hands begin to shake. Your eyes tear up. Face it. You're a Spring Break junkie and it's miles away.

What's a student to do?

Don't despair or go into total withdrawal quite yet—you've got a friend in your VCR. When the sun goes down on all the Spring Break addicts of America, it's time to turn inward and remember what made days gone by so memorable. So while there is still an element of Spring Break splendor running rampant in your addled brain, run, don't walk to your nearest video store and taste a trifle of that celluloid perfection—the Beach Movie. Here is a listing of some of the ecstasies -and agonies- of beach-related fare as only Hollywood can dream it up.

The first Spring Break flick, Where The Boys Are, hit the beach in 1960. In a burst of virginal glory, four college girls descend on Ft. Lauderdale in search of Mr. Right. It starred the heartthrobs of the day and gave current talk show host George Hamilton his first opportunity to work on his eternal tan.

Frankie Avalon and Annette Funicello became the crown couple of the Spring Break empire and the royalty of Beach Party movies. Being impossible to give a plot synopsis (there isn't any plot) for Beach Party flicks, let's just say it's sun, sand, songs and relationship sob stories. Fortunately, several of the Beach Party movies are available on video cassette and some even on laserdisc. Beach Party (1963) was the first of the series with the gang tossing back a cola or two and riding the waves. In 1964, Muscle Beach Party pumped up the box office gross and Beach Blanket Bingo hit the screen in 1965. Surf Party was wedged in between with a 1964 release and for you die-hards, don't forget the entire Gidget series, especially that masterpiece, Gidget Goes Hawaiian. Who could ever forgive writers who named a character Moondoggie?

Many of the most popular Spring Break destinations have multiple pages on variety of Web sites. (Info is literally like everywhere!) The sites list information on the region, activities, tourist attractions, local hotels and nightclubs. Many sites also throw in juicy beach pictures to entice you to come to their sunny location.

Each January, destinations start listing their local Spring Break events, such as what concerts are happening, which corporate sponsors are coming and where you can find the traditional beach beauty contests. Don't worry, if you're searching for wet T-shirt contests, you can find them on the Web, too.

Last year, The World's Most Famous Beach welcomed over 200,000 students for Spring Break.

The beach is huge and 500 feet wide, which allows for lots of action like beach cruisers and motor bikes. Yes, driving on the shore is allowed during the day! Other activities available include surfing, skimming, surf fishing, volleyball and jet skiing.

During Spring Break, there are many special events on the beach. Some planned this year are: Sports Illustrated Spring Break Beach Club (March 11-21), Citibank/MasterCard Coed Spring Break Beach Volleyball Tournament (March 11-31), Spring Break Career Fair (March 14-15), Spring Break Sports Challenge (March 18-23) and the 13th Annual Miss Hawaiian Tropic International Beauty Pageant Finals (March 22).

Daytona Beach also has great outdoor shopping, tasty restaurants and live night life. Top name entertainers appear regularly at the Ocean Center and there are numerous nightclubs where you can party with thousands of other college students. Don't worry about there not being enough room—there are 16,000 hotel rooms.

and starred a tribe of the resident hunks of the day, especially Troy Donahue leading the pack of trolling guys. The tide began to ebb in the mid-60's however. The British invasion changed the music scene and the focus altered from The Beach Boys and Jan and Dean to The Beatles, The Rolling Stones and The Dave Clark Five. Suddenly it was posh to look pasty. "Be Good to Your School" gave way to "Sticky Fingers."

In 1966, The Endless Summer, an in depth look at the surfing scene at the world's best beaches, was a hit, but it spelled the end to things surf-related. Haight Ashbury and the San Francisco hippie counter-culture sprang out of London's Carnaby Street allure. It seemed the days of purity and sunsets and the wholesome antics of Spring Break fare like Where The Boys Are were on a temporary vacation.

After a decade and a half of screen absence, suddenly, in the 1980's, it was cool to go back to the beach. Frankie and Annette did so in their reunion by that very name. But, Back To The Beach was a box office wipeout. Frankie and Annette were a little too old to croon about summer love and the importance of a good tan. Even Where The Boys Are became a remake in 1983, featuring a then little-known Lisa Hartman (now Lisa Hartman-Black, she married singer Clint Black a few years back). Just to show how times had changed, the remake had our four vestal virgins traipsing down the beach in search of tawdry sex. (As a point of reference, this movie was produced by the same guy who put the Village People on the big screen.)

Matt Dillon became a cabana boy at a plush club in order to be near the girl he loved over his summer break. The Flamingo Kid is a cut above the usual teen-angst movies. It has a smart script and cast. The quintessentially-titled but laff-inducing break movie, Spring Break, also hit theatres in 1983 along with Surf II, another winner in the bad-movies-we-love category.

Then, in 1985, a movie came out that changed the image of beach-related Spring Break films. Rob Reiner directed a smart and funny little epistle called The Sure Thing. It tops everyone's list of great break movies. Its cast features John Cusack as a college boy trying to cross the country over Spring Break in order to meet up with a friend in L.A. who guarantees him a sure thing. Daphne

PANAMA CITY BEACH

PANAMA CITY BEACH IS BIGGER, BOLDER AND BADDER THAN EVER!

Although Hurricane Opal delivered a heavy blow last fall, it was not a K.O. Actually, Hurricane Opal did Breakers a big favor. The beach is actually larger and much of PCB has a phat new look. However, we should warn you, some things haven't changed—the sun, warm water and the party attitude.

Last year, over 550,000 students from colleges across the country came to Panama City Beach to party. College students choose Panama City Beach as their Spring Break destination for all the right reasons—27 miles of beautiful snow white beaches, emerald green waters along the Gulf of Mexico and value on a tight budget. There's a wide variety of cool (and cheap) activities, such as beach volleyball, wind surfing, parasailing or numerous activities sponsored by hotels such as the Holiday Inn SunSpree, Ramada, Days Inn and the Boardwalk Beach Resort. What's more, the Coca-Cola Jam Fest rocks PCB every year. Whether you're working on your tan or checking out the mobile scenery, you'll never be bored on this beach.

After the sun goes down, PCB gets even better. Two of the largest and coolest nightclubs in the world are located here—Spinnaker Beach Club and Club La Vela. The music scene at PCB is on top with international artists ranging from Boston alternative rockers Letters to Cleo, Belgium's Lords of Acid and London's Ned's Atomic Dustbin. What's more, legends of classic rock like Fleetwood Mac, 38 Special and Foreigner also trek here to jam. What about rap, hip-hop, techno or jungle? Don't worry, you'll find it here, too.

You'll also discover there is food for all tastes and budgets in PCB. Whether you crave a huge seafood buffet or thick, juicy burger, you can stay within your budget and eat in your bathing suit. All restaurants honor the beach's mandatory dress code...casual.

One of the best things about spending Spring Break at Panama City Beach is—believe it or not—the police. You can party on the beach and the local cops are really cool. In fact, they are so cool here, some cops actually have been seen welcoming students. (Hard to imagine...but it has happened. It must mean that the city really wants Breakers to come!)

So come on down and check out PCB. There are 18,000 hotel rooms, but they are filling fast.

Two-Nation Vacation

Don't forget South Padre's only 25 miles from Mexico. Spring Break visitors will enjoy the colorful ambiance of nearby Matamoros, Mexico. Along with bright serapes, silver jewelry, leather goods and hand-woven blankets, Matamoros features some of the hottest fajitas and coldest cervezas along the border. Customs is generally pretty laid back— proof of citizenship in the form of a driver's license normally suffices. Driving across the border into Mexico is legal, but be sure to carry proof of insurance in your car. If you get into a fender bender in Mexico, you are "guilty until proven innocent" under Mexican law. Due to recent changes in Mexican law, "mordida" (a bribe) is not recommended, so just go with the flow and be careful.

There is a hysterical little bit by then unknown Tim Robbins as a driver who advertises for car-poolers to share costs on the journey.

If your bleary eyes can still focus after the barrage of break-and-beach related fare, test one or two more. Though Kathryn Bigelow is known for her visual-feast movies, like Near Dark and Strange Days, she also waded out into the surf with an explosive and adrenaline pumped beach-bound odyssey a few years back—Point Break. It starred Keanu Reeves as Johnny Utah, an FBI rookie on the trail of the bank robbing ex-Presidents gang led by Zen surf-king Patrick Swayze.

And, not to neglect the ultimate Spring Break sport—volleyball—there is Side Out, a 1990 sports flick that is available on cassette and laserdisc, too. Ironically, the final entry (so far) in our series of water-logged titles allows us to come full circle in our quest for the best beach movies. In 1994, The Endless Summer II came out, documenting the continuing saga of the never-ending search for that perfect wave that began with its 1966 predecessor.

So, here's the scoop—by the time you make it through all these titles, it will be March. The sun will be out and it'll be time to bake, do some sit-ups and get into shape so you look buff when you set that first foot onto the warm, waiting sands of Panama City Beach, Daytona Beach, South Padre Island and all those other shores devoted to ensuring that your Spring Break thirst will finally be quenched.

Police arrest two after break–in at Old Chapel

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Police arrested two non-students Thursday evening for breaking and entering the Old Chapel.

Band members returned to the Old Chapel after the men's basketball game versus La Salle and found three to five men who were "out of place."

Band members did not respond immediately since the Chapel is open to the public and non-band members frequently come in. However, recent thefts in the Chapel caused members to be cautious. Erin Wheeler said, locks for the music lockers were broken last semester when several instruments were stolen.

Peter Farrell, a sophomore legal studies major, became suspicious of the individuals after they went to the basement and did not turn on any lights. He followed the men down the stairs to ask them if they had a class.

"They said, 'Yeah we have a class at 10 p.m.,' then they all ran away in different directions," Farrell said. "They knew their way around the Chapel. I ran after one guy [who tried to get away by] slamming a plate glass door on my face. He ran through the classrooms and threw recycling bins at me while escaping through the back door."

Band members chased the men to the campus pond where they stopped. The men claimed they didn't do anything wrong, so the students convinced them to return to the Chapel to check if anything was missing, Farrell said.

The police arrested the two men immediately for breaking and entering at nighttime and for destruction of property.

James P. Pruitt, 21, of 54 Bridge Ave., South Hadley and Jeremy C. Lashway, 19, of 25 New Ludlow Rd., Granby were arrested by the University of Massachusetts Police following an attempt to flee. Lashway was also charged with possession of a class D substance.

A third individual escaped from authorities.

Several witnesses positively identified Pruitt and Lashway as the individuals inside the Chapel. Farrell gave a statement to police and the individuals were arraigned in Hampshire County Court on Friday. Trial dates are set for Feb. 29 and March 14.

Farrell was taken to Health Services for treatment for superficial wounds. Glass from the broken window was removed from his hands.

"The injuries aren't a big deal," Farrell said.

Pruitt and Lashway are not connected to the robberies of instruments from the Fine Arts Center, according to Phil Cavanaugh, associate director of the University Police Department.

Republican candidates make their final push to N.H. voters

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

MANCHESTER, N.H. — In a final burst of contentious campaigning, Republican presidential rivals battled across the state and the airwaves on Monday, vying for support in New Hampshire's leadoff primary. A struggling Bob Dole was the principal target.

EMILY BELT

Pat Buchanan

In a statistical dead heat in polls with commentator Pat Buchanan, the Senate majority leader wrapped up his campaign with a torchlight rally in rustic Milford.

"Tomorrow night we're going to win New Hampshire. Then we're going to North Dakota, South Dakota, all over America," Dole told cheering supporters, North and South Dakota hold primaries next Tuesday.

But, Dole was not predicting a big win here in his third bid for the presidency. "I'll settle for one vote," he told his audience. On the eve of the voting, polls of likely New Hampshire GOP voters showed Dole fighting Buchanan for first, with former Tennessee Gov. Lamar Alexander in close pursuit and publisher Steve Forbes in fourth.

The negative attacks that made this the nastiest New Hampshire primary ever continued to the very end. Buchanan ran a new ad accusing Dole of being "a desperate man" while Alexander accused Dole of being without "one fresh idea."

Both Dole and Alexander ganged up on Buchanan for his trade-protectionist views.

"However it comes out tomorrow, I'm going to be doing very well," Alexander said as he finished his own campaign and his 100-mile walk across the state with a mile-and-a-half stroll in Portsmouth to a waterfront park. "People are going to be looking at a weakened Dole..."

Alexander, clad in his trademark red and black plaid work shirt, was accompanied by about 150 similarly attired supporters. Voting was beginning at midnight in two tiny towns in northern New Hampshire.

RSO coalition at head of talks; discussing use of student funds

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

A coalition of Registered Students Organizations (RSOs) met with Administration officials Friday to discuss the restructuring of the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF).

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson and Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page talked to students representing a diverse array of organizations, listening to their concerns about the viability of student activity budgets.

The $1.7 million SATF provides resources to all RSOs. It is the only fund at the University controlled by students.

Students are asking that the University remove restrictions on the SATF, which drains approximately $450,000 from the fund to pay administrative taxes or to finance services such as the Five College Bus System.

Students at the meeting said extracurricular activities are a essential component to a positive experience at the University.

"It's not just about the classroom, it's about real-life experience," said Tim Fisk, a representative of the Theater Guild.

"We're learning stuff in our student groups which we don't learn in class," said Michael Hass, student coordinator for the student center for educational research and advocacy. "For us to be able to do these things, it takes dollars."

Robinson said fundamentally that he agrees with student demands.

"I really do believe that the University has a broader obligation to support out-of-classroom activities more than the way they do at this time," Robinson said. "I am one of your advocates."

However, Robinson was skeptical towards the specifics of student demands. He cited already existing restraints on the University budget.

"We don't have enough dollars to go around," Robinson said. "Everyone is looking for the same kind of relief."

Robinson also criticized students for imposing a Feb. 26 deadline on the chancellor to resolve the issue. He said a more long-term approach is in order.

"Unfortunately, UMass doesn't move that fast on a lot of fronts," Robinson said.

Hass, however, disagreed with Robinson's assertions that the University lacks funding for SATF relief. He said that student life simply needs to be made a priority.

Hass pointed to the Chancellor's Strategic Thinking Document, which seeks to reallocate $33 million dollars within the University. If student concerns are taken seriously, said Hass, the money could be found to "enhance student life on this campus."

Page reiterated the Administrations stance, emphasizing that the entire campus is competing for funds.

Robinson said that many faculty and administrators are not convinced on the critical importance of RSO activities, in terms of funding, opting instead to focus on the University's academic strengths.

"I'd really like to work with [students] to develop a strategy so we have a win, win situation," Robinson said.

Student groups have already endorsed a plan that points to three potential sources of SATF relief. These include transforming the financial burden of student bus services to the Administration. In addition, the plan asks that the University withdraw taxes currently placed on the trust.

"I can't support you on these points," Robinson said. "I think that there is a better way."

Students, however, maintained support for the four-point plan, which mirrors the motion passed by the Student Government Association Senate last week.

"As students who pay to come here — not to be here — we know what we need," said Hass.

Discussions between the newly formed student coalition and the administration are expected to continue up until Feb. 26.

Broken water sprinkler floods Coolidge Hall

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

The 10th floor of Coolidge Residence Hall was flooded after a sprinkler was accidently triggered early Monday morning. Several hundred gallons of water leaked out of a room and covered the rest of the floor.

Residence Director Jeff Cullen said, a heat-sensitive sprinkler was activated after the cage protecting it was damaged around 12:20 a.m. Environment Health and Safety was notified and arrived about half an hour later to turn off the sprinkler.

"I don't think there are any warnings in the room, but common sense tells you not to [damage it]," Cullen said.

Floor residence assistant Jim Cryan said six wet-vacuums were used to mop-up the water. Maintenance worked until 3:30 a.m. to remove water that spread out of the room and to the rest of the building's floor. Residence staff unlocked many of the rooms since many students were gone over the long weekend.

Harris Scher, a first-year undeclared student said he was almost electrocuted when he tried to turn his television on upon returning. He found his shoes and rug soaked with water.

"I heard that somebody decided to play with the ring around the sensor, trying to knock it off with a hammer," Scher said. "He didn't mean to have water come out."

George La Marre, a senior sport management major combated the tide of water by placing his laundry against the door. La Marre was awakened by the fire alarm and saw water coming through the lounge area.

"I was up until 5 a.m. helping clean up my buddies' room," La Marre said. "They went home for the weekend."

The water seeped through the floor and engulfed Nicole Way's room. Her clothes, rug and television were damaged because of the flood. Way, a first-year sport management major said the water was up to her ankles.

"I was up until three while they were wet-vaccing my room," Way said. "I stayed in my friend's room for the night."

Residents were most concerned about how their property would be reimbursed. Students were told to ask their parents if they are covered under a homeowner's or renter's insurance policy.

Cryan said the residents of the room where the sprinkler was activated were advised not to talk about the incident. Refusing to comment further, a resident of the room said, "There was no smoke or fire in the room to the best of my knowledge."

National committee begins to look into adjusting primaries

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — The eyes of the country are going to be on New Hampshire today, as voters cast their ballots in the nation's first presidential primary.

But some officials want other states to share the limelight. The National Association of Secretaries of State has formed a committee to study revamping the primary schedule to extend the selection process and give more weight to smaller states.

"Our hope is to work out a calendar that once again stretches out the process for a number of months, beginning with smaller states and ending with the larger ones," said William F. Galvin, Massachusetts' secretary of state and a member of the committee. Galvin warned that bunching the primaries so closely together was having a bad effect on the whole process of electing a president.

"Because of these early primaries, the filing dates are closed and it's almost impossible for new candidates to emerge," he said. "One of the other side effects is the intensification in media spending as opposed to individual campaigning."

New Hampshire's Secretary of State Bill Gardner, newly elected to head the commission, said he will work to maintain New Hampshire's traditional first-in-the-nation status.

Gardner said the 15-member bipartisan panel representing the secretaries of state will review the latest trend of holding primary and caucus elections earlier and earlier.

Gardner said he was pleasantly surprised to realize he was not the only secretary of state concerned that so many states have moved up their primary dates so they encroach on each other. "By the end of March, more than half of the states will have held their primaries or caucuses," said Gardner. "The Arizona primary is set for Feb. 27 along with North and South Dakota. South Carolina is March 2. The New England primary is March 5. New York is on the 7th. This is a bang, bang, bang situation."

Gardner said the group hopes to agree on recommendations for changes before the national political party conventions in August. In most states, Galvin said, secretaries of state are also chief electoral officers, which allows them to set primary dates. He said the panel was looking at a variety of strategies to get states to reschedule their primaries, including awarding more delegates to states that hold later votes.

"The country only focuses on this issue every four years," he said. "If remedial action is not taken now, nothing will get done."

Retreat focuses on GLBT pride

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

The quiet Quaker retreat house provided a perfect environment to conduct such a weekend. Set far back on farm land, it seemed as if it were almost entirely cut off form the outside world. In a time where not everybody is accepting, the 48 hours spent in this peaceful house enabled many to have a cathartic experience.

Pride, unity, understanding, acceptance, acknowledgement, respect and a strong unified voice were some of the commonalities that were discussed at the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender retreat this past weekend.

Examining Queer Identities and Creating Queer Community was an education class that was offered in a workshop setting at Woolman Hill in Deerfield. An important reason for having this retreat was to give GLBT students the chance to discuss personal issues concerning the queer community in a safe environment.

Both students and facilitators hope to be able to conduct comparable weekends each semester. This workshop was the first of its kind to be presented by the University of Massachusetts. The success of the weekend will determine if the school of education will offer a similar workshop in the future. The overwhelming response from those who attended felt that it was a positive experience.

"The weekend was more than I had ever expected," facilitator Dawn Bond said. "Connections were made, ideas shared, differences discussed and community was built. I truly believe this weekend was a once in a lifetime experience for me and other GLB folks."

For some students this was a time of awakening. It was the first time that they had ever been able to discuss their sexuality and this weekend provided and outlet for doing not only that, but learning more about themselves. Annie Pennola, a sophomore, decided to take this course to speak with other students who had been experiencing the same feelings she was having.

"I felt that it was important to explore my bisexual

Women's sports strive for recognition

By Alison Crawford
Collegian Correspondent

"In a race of 5000 entrants the top woman may come in 66th, but we only hear about the 65 men who finished before her. We never hear about the 4,934 people that this woman beat, all the other women and men who finished behind her."

This is a view of male versus female athletes contributing to the resistance of gender equity in athletics, according to Mary Jo Kane, a sports sociologist at the University of Minnesota, who lectured at Smith College Thursday.

Kane spoke of the need for gender equality, and on certain levels, for integration of women onto men's athletic teams.

Gender discrimination in athletics stems from stereotypical notions dealing with female athletes, she said.

Kane claimed there are two mutually exclusive, bipolar categories of men versus women. This binary system is hierarchically ordered, and within it male athletic supremacy is "biologically based," according to Kane.

Kane, countered that by saying "females being inherently inferior to males is a social construct." If placed along a performance continuum there would be a greater number of matches between athlete performance curves, she said.

The speech was based on a paper in which Kane wrote that there are specific mechanisms of continuum containment that actively support the traditional gender-based separation of athletes. The most obvious mechanisms are those of sport typing, or the channeling of athletes into sports that are stereotyped by gender roles.

Kane termed another method "Deviant-Mutant" or the "resistance to let exceptional female athletes perform at their highest level of ability" by instilling doubt in the athletes performance by questioning their femininity.

Kane pointed to the example of the mandatory chromosome test that all female Olympians are subjected to in order to prove that they are indeed female, and consequently eligible to compete at the Olympic games. She was angered by the fact that the IOC needed genetic verification that the athlete was in fact an exceptional female athlete, and not a man trying to compete as a female.

In the move towards equality in collegiate athletics, Title IX legislation was passed, and therefore created innumerable opportunities for female athletes across the country. It demands equal representation of mens' and womens' athletic teams and an equal amount of funding for those teams. The University of Massachusetts was one of the first schools to comply with Title IX legislation, elevating womens' crew and womens' water polo to varsity status last year.

When questioned on the impact that her theory would have on Title IX, Ramstead stated, "This will begin to provide evidence that women can actually outperform men in sports."

Basketball fans surf the Internet

By Melanie B. Arruda
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is the 30th school to broadcast every basketball game played by the nation's top-ranked team via the AudioNet World Wide Web (WWW) site.

Minuteman basketball fans across the country and overseas need to have sound-card-equipped computers in order to listen. Users must also have a direct connection to the Internet or a University Point to Point (PPP) account in order to listen to the free game broadcasts over the Internet, said UMass student Ben DeLong who collaborated with Art Clifford in developing the site.

It is expected that more than 10 million personal computer users are able to receive these audio broadcasts on their machines, based on industry estimates. Broadcasts are only delayed by one to five seconds, according to DeLong.

Internet broadcasts of University basketball games will be available at no-cost and broadcasts will be archived so that fans can re-listen or listen later, DeLong said. The first archived broadcasts on the AudioNet Web Site include the Jan. 23 game against Pittsburgh and the Jan. 24 coach John Calipari radio show.

Radio broadcasts transmitted over the Internet have become popular because of the easy-to-use "point-and-click" software, according to DeLong. He is currently volunteering his time to make the broadcasts of the basketball games over the Internet.

DeLong uses a desktop computer provided by the University's Division of Student Affairs to download the radio broadcasts of UMass games. Permission must first be obtained by the local radio station WHMP in Northampton, which produces and broadcasts all of the Minuteman games.

The broadcast signal is transmitted from the University to a WWW site in Dallas, called AudioNet, which hosts broadcasts of many college teams around the United States. AudioNet's broadcasts also include talk radio shows, talk shows and National Public Radio.

Behind-the-scenes University administrator volunteers include Laura Tilsley, associate director of networking and information systems at the Student Affairs Office, and Associate Vice Chancellor for University Advancement John Feudo.

Tilsley volunteered the use of a new Pentium desktop computer that runs Windows NT software used to link up with AudioNet's machines in Texas.

Feudo was among the earliest advocates of using the Internet to broadcast University basketball games. His broadcast experience consists of over 10 years and a show he produces called "UMass Matters" on WHMP.

"I think it's a great idea because so many UMass alumni and fans around the world are online," Feudo said. "For them to be able to access something as positive as UMass basketball can only boost the University's image."

Over 15,000 UMass basketball fans are already following the Minutemen's progress on the Internet via an electronic newsletter created last year by University alumnus and White House Associated Press Correspondent Kenneth Bazinet. The newsletter includes quotes, up-to-the-minute updates and statistics about the Minuteman basketball team, DeLong said.

"One of our goals has been to broadcast UMass games over the Armed Forces Network so we'd be able to reach hoop fans overseas," said WHMP Sports Director Marc Vandermeer. "With the opportunity to broadcast over the Internet, we can do that now — and more."

"I hope to see more than men's basketball," said DeLong in reference to the future of the AudioNet WWW site.

The WWW address for anyone wanting to listen to UMass Minuteman Basketball broadcasts is: http://www.audionet.com/pub/umass/umass.htm.

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

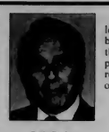
The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Would you support legislation further reducing the number of legal immigrants allowed in this country?

Bill Clinton

"I support lowering the level of legal immigration by a moderate amount at this time, as recommended by former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan, Chair of the Commission on Immigration Reform. Legal immigration reform must be based upon principles that are pro-family, pro-work, and pro-naturalization, retaining opportunities for family reunification at the levels are lowered. We must not let this issue become divisive in this country."



Bob Dole

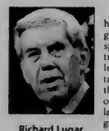
"I believe our system of legal immigration needs to be re-examined. As part of this re-examination, I support a modest, temporary reduction in the annual rate of legal immigration."

Lamar Alexander

"No. Legal immigration is not the problem. Illegal immigration, however, is a problem. We must distinguish between the two and avoid treating those who have come to this country legally — those who play by the rules, pay taxes, and obey the law — as if they were criminals. I would consider legislation that redefined our legal immigration criteria so that we can continue to attract the best people from around the world who want to work hard and make a contribution to American life."

Pat Buchanan

"Yes. I would put a five-year moratorium on legal immigration; however, exceptions would be made for the spouses and minor children of American citizens."



Richard Lugar

"No, I would give priority, however, to new legal immigrants who bring capital and special talents to our country. Simply mandating that legal immigration be curtailed will do little to solve the major problem, which is our ability to enforce current laws relating to illegal immigration."

identity in the community and to find visibility and acceptance," Pennola said.

Other students who had been more active within the community came on the weekend to not only promote unity within the community, but to share ideas with others who up until this point may not have been visible.

"I thought this weekend was very effective," said Chaya Radin, a resident of the 2 in 20 floor. "I came to meet more gay people, and see what people had to say other than my friends. I also wanted to learn about what other people felt about issues in the gay community."

From the early hours of Saturday morning to the sunset of Sunday afternoon, students worked on many different problems and solutions within the queer community. The six facilitators took many different approaches to work for a common solution. Whether it was unifying the group as a whole, or breaking down into smaller groups, all worked for a common cause, the strengthening of the queer community.

But many of the discussions provided the opportunity to discuss personal problems within the community. Some students came on the retreat being very out and open, and some divulged their sexual orientation for the first time. Yet everybody came knowing that they would receive the support that may have been lacking elsewhere.

One facet of the retreat was when students split up into groups based on their sexual orientation. Each facilitator led a group which discussed students feelings regarding their particular orientation. The smaller groups provided more of an outlet to speak with others that were more similar.

However sexuality and orientation did not dominate the discussions. Often students sat in a circle without the facilitators to converse about everything from racism and sexism to discrimination. These casual group discussions exemplified the overall themes of sharing and acceptance that was felt throughout the weekend. Many never had the opportunity to discuss many of these issues, at least not in an environment that was not judgmental.

Harsh R. Shah, a senior, was also very pleased with the retreat.

"I learned a lot about myself and everyone else in the queer community and the important part of this whole workshop was for me to get to know people that I had not gotten to know before," he said. "I wanted to learn about how they deal with their own problems through their culture and background and the hopes and dreams of everyone."

From the individual caucus groups to dancing on Saturday night, the overall response was overwhelmingly positive. Many came on the retreat for different reasons, yet all left with a common goal — to strengthen the queer community. Especially in a presidential election year, there is a pressing need to make the community stronger and more visible. Presidential candidates need to know that the queer community is becoming larger and more influential every year and will continue to grow.

Opinion/Editorial

Just do it

Dawn Jennings

Someone once asked me what I thought was the biggest change I'd made since high school. The question baffled me at the time.

"I'm completely different," I thought. "I have to pick one thing?" I couldn't do it.

However, since my roommates went home this weekend, I had ample time on my hands to ponder this question more. (Yes, after two days I got sick of the weekend-long Real World reunion) and I've come up with an answer.

The biggest change I've made since high school is that I've learned to take more risks.

Now I guess I did take some in high school. I did the usual rebellious things. Going to parties I wasn't supposed to, talking on the phone at four in the morning on a school night's, and yes, I even snuck out of my house a couple times. Yet these really only involved the risk of being caught by my parents.

Subconsciously, a little part of me probably even wanted to be discovered. Didn't we all kind of want our parents to find out after we'd done something outrageous. Just to be able to say, "See, I can fly to California for the weekend and you can't do anything about it."

Yet the things I usually did weren't really anything I had a genuine fear to do. It's not too too scary to stay over at a friends house, even if it is until four in the morning. I also never did take that trip to California. (It was only one of those distant dreams of mine).

However, within the last few years, I have done a lot of things that I once would never have had the guts to do. I've even made up my mind that I'm going to give blood next week. To me, a very big risk, considering my extreme dislike of needles. Once, I had to be held down for the doctor to administer the shot. Unfortunately I can't say that I was very young at the time either (beware Red Cross).

Two summers ago I went to Woodstock with four of my friends. Something which probably wouldn't have even crossed my mind to do a few years earlier. The whole experience was an adventure and definitely a bit of a risk. However, two events in particular stick out in my mind as times I will never forget.

After we finally set up our tent we walked down to one of the concert stages. The sights we saw were indescribable. There were thousands of people walking around. There were people moshing and crowd surfers everywhere. We also saw dozens of people jumping in the mud. These people weren't just a little dirty, they were covered from head to toe. It took me a matter of minutes to decide that it would be a lot of fun to join them.

There were also many people around us taking pictures. Kind of standing on the side while they filmed these other people having the time of their life. It was then that I decided that I wouldn't go home with any pictures of other people having fun unless I, myself, was also having the experience. So I grabbed my friend and we went down to the edge of the mud.

Then it was out of our control. Within seconds, we were covered. We were running around, dancing to, "Blister in the Sun," and involved in a certain bond with our fellow "mud people." True, it was only Friday and we weren't leaving until Sunday. Our one change of clothes didn't quite seem like enough anymore. We were covered in mud with the only running water being a couple little faucets and the hope that it would rain soon and wash us off.

We knew it would be days before we could take a hot shower and be clean again, but I think that only made it more fun.

The other very memorable experience I had that weekend was when I went crowd surfing. None of my friends wanted to join me and it would have been easy for me to forget about it, but I decided not to let this stop me. I made up my mind when we arrived that I would crowd surf that weekend. And I did. I ended up getting lost from my friends, got my one change of clothes muddy, and acquired numerous bruises, but I'm so glad I did it.

What did I gain from these events? Eventually I did find my friends. I got a nice clean shower, actually it was more like a couple of clean showers, and all my bruises eventually healed. The memories I hold of those experiences however, cannot compare to any of the inconveniences I endured. I'm not sure if you've seen them, but every time I come across one of those Bold detergent ads that show the girl covered in mud at Woodstock, I'm reminded how much the experience was worth. Instead of looking at the picture and thinking, "Wow, that looks like a lot of fun," I can instead say, "Wow, that was a lot of fun."

Personally, I try to make the most of life. There are definitely things I've done that I would never do again, (most of freshman year comes to mind). Yet these regrets are not nearly as upsetting as things I never did that I wish I had.

Take a look at your life. Are you making the most of it? Or will you look back, after many opportunities have gone by, and say, "Gee, there are so many thing I never did. So many things I wish I had made time for. So many things I was too afraid to do." Whatever the risk you need to take, whether it's to go sky diving, or jump in the mud, or tell those people who mean the most to you, just how much you do care, do it. Take a risk, because as one of my favorite quotes says,

"It is better to regret something you've done than to regret something you haven't done."

The hidden enemy

Mark McGrath

Sometimes in life, we are faced with enemies who can not be seen yet whose effects are so devastating that it is a wonder how they are not exposed. Once exposed, people become angry at themselves and society for not even thinking of taking the time to care.

Take the case of Cynthia Wiggins as an example. She was a 17-year-old mother planning a marriage and dreaming of a medical career. Last December, she was still working as a cashier at a mall in the suburbs of Buffalo. That was until she was killed on the way to that job. She was hit by a dump truck while attempting to cross the seven lane highway which stood between her bus stop and the mall. On the surface, her death could have been seen as an unfortunate accident, but there was a story below the surface, and once discovered, it shed light on one of the most disturbing truths that remain in our society.

You see, her bus came from the city and unlike other buses was not allowed to stop in the parking lot of the mall. Instead, its riders were forced to negotiate the monster of a highway that effectively formed a barrier between the mall and travelers from the poorer neighborhoods of Buffalo.

Why was the city bus not allowed to stop where more affluent busses were? The truth has come out. It seems the management of the mall and some of the businesses within had arranged that inner-city busses would never stop on mall property, in effect denying a large portion of the poorer, predominately black denizens of Buffalo access to the mall. Those who decided to use the mall, like Cynthia Wiggins, had to chance their lives every trip in.

Nowadays, more and more businesses are moving away from the cities of America and into the suburbs. In doing so, they are taking with them jobs that once kept the poorer residents of the city on their feet. To keep their heads above water, the people have to follow these jobs to the suburbs as Cynthia Wiggins had done. All too often, they are not wanted and are denied rights that others take for granted.

While racism is clearly an issue here, it did not seem to be noticed until a young girl had to pay with her life. By turning a black and white issue into an inner-city and suburban issue, the powers that be were able to keep their blatant racist policies out of the public eye and their malls inaccessible to a large number of people who they considered undesirable. Again, we are faced with a case of racism rearing its ugly head.

It is time for our society to acknowledge that while strides have been taken to diminish the effects of racism, the problem is far from over. Like many germs out there today, it cleverly hides and changes its appearance often, so as not to be discovered and destroyed.

If we are ever going to have equality in our society, we are going to have to look for injustices with a keener eye and stomp them out more quickly than we have in the past. We cannot let situations like this go unnoticed as the Buffalo mall situation was for eight years.

While unnecessary, Cynthia Wiggins' death wasn't for naught because it helped us to see what we could not before. It put on the front page, tendencies so ugly that we tend to want to repress them.

Inner-city busses now pull right up next to that mall and the two other area malls that had similar policies. After eight years of unsuccessful attempts, the transit service has done what it wanted to do all the time. It has given the city access to the suburbs. The question that remains is if and how the suburbs will counter the move. There's no doubt it will be sneaky, and you can bet a battle will be fought, but with a little extra care we can fight it, for these types of problems exist not only outside Buffalo, but everywhere in society.

We must realize that the force of racism is still out there and it is strong and sometimes it will be hidden, but that doesn't mean we have to accept it. Only when we realize these things will we be able to fight one of the most virulent forces in our world today.

Southern crossing

Tim White

Let's talk long trips, shall we?

I spent 12 hours, with four other people crammed into something the size of a clown car, driving to Virginia. If you think about it, including the trip home, that is 24 waking hours shoe-horned into a box with four other people. It got a little tough after a while — we had to eat the little guy.

But more important than realizing that your body can live on Slim Jims and Dr. Pepper and the entire East Coast is saturated with terrible radio stations, is the difference between the people in the North and the people in the South.

Our first experience with southern hospitality was a hotel clerk that thought all our names were that aninual in the woods you see tied to the front of pick-up trucks during hunting season. We could have said anything to this woman and she would still love us.

"Hey lady, does that mole on your face have a name or do you just prefer to highlight it with all that hair protruding from it?"

"No, deer, but thanks for asking ... do you need more towels, deer?"

The southern drawl was another obstacle to tackle. You can't help but look stupid when things like "y'all" and "yesiree" fly out. I was often times looking for sub-titles when talking to these people.

That got me and a friend of mine in some trouble during dinner one time. We were all sitting in a restaurant, speculating on some appetizers when my friend Mike and I decided to split a plate of wings. We ordered them from the waitress, and she said, "'round here, we like to call 'em wigsaaphaa."

I gave Mike the "what the hell did she just say" look. But instead of being rude, we just did the universal laugh hoping what she said was supposed to be funny and not "that was my mother's last meal."

After we were done laughing, Mike said "Ah, OK, but if we could have them mild, that would be great."

The plate came with a big side dish of blue cheese dressing and celery. Wings in the South, by the way, must have come off of a pterodactyl because they were huge. So Mike and I each picked up one of these portable hermas and dove in. They were delicious, the best wings I have ever had in my life.

Then, someone decided to empty a bottle of butane in my mouth, light it on fire and rub with a Brill-o pad. I decided right then and there I had eaten the sun. As Mike and I were wiping the tears from our face, trying to remain conscious and wondering when the feeling was going to return to our mouths, my friend from Virginia, who can understand fluent drawl, enlightened us.

"Well, you should have expected it, you ordered their wings."

"Yeah," I said, not knowing that drool was pouring from my mouth, "but we ordered them mild."

"Mild?" he laughed, "I don't think you can order the Wings of Fire mild."

Wigsaaphaa was Wings of Fire. When the waitress put the order in for "Wings of Fire, mild," the cooks must have all started screaming "we got a Yankee!"

The really funny part about the whole thing was three other people had to sit in the car with Mike and I after we ate the "Wings of Fire."

Southern hospitality is for real, though. Everyone pretty much exudes niceness. The only jerks were the people visiting from up North.

I do not think, however, that Pennsylvania caught the "southern hospitality" bug from it's neighboring states. We stopped in Harrisburg, Penn., on the way back for the night. Approximately 98 percent of the people there were jerks. Waiters obviously don't care about tips and people in bars all want to show you how tough they are — even the women. Owning big trucks with big tires must be a state law, and attitudes were plentiful.

The bar we went into had more beef-cakes and cheeseballs in it than a Dairy Mart snack counter. Plus, it had 554 men and two women.

All in and all, I recommend going down south for whatever reason. Just don't stop in Pennsylvania and bring a southern/English dictionary for your own safety.

If you're ever in Blacksburg Virginia, go to Macadoos and order the wings. They're good.

Reach out and touch someone

Justin C. Smith

Did you ever not talk to someone for a long time and then were afraid to call them after not speaking for so long? Communication or lack thereof, is a major reason why so many different relationships end with someone saying or doing something the wrong way or just doing nothing at all.

I am under the impression that the person who coined the phrase, "Why can't we all just get along" didn't have such great lines of communication.

The last time I talked to my father was freshman year when I just called him to say "Hi" and tell him I was thinking about him. My father and I hadn't seen one another since I was in middle school and that was for three days. Since then, we only spoke on holidays. I wanted to try and have a better relationship with him as I was entering a different world and wanted his input.

This call out of the blue was not a regular occurrence because to find a time to talk to my father when he was coherent was nearly impossible. During that phone call my father told me in his own way that he didn't have the time for me and unless I needed something urgently, that he couldn't afford to talk to me.

I was so offended and resented the statement that a $2 phone conversation from Texas to Massachusetts for his eldest son was something that he could not afford.

Since that night I haven't spoken with him mostly because I know that with everything he has done to myself and my brother and mother, he's embarrassed and feels guilty. It eases his pain when we don't talk because with him it is out of mind when out of earshot, never-mind sight.

In these years I have lost so much not telling him how I feel. Not being able to say that no matter what, he is my father and no matter what, I loved him, but he has left my life for the simple fact he loves me and I respect that.

Even with that in mind, the fact that I have no idea how to reach him bothers me. If we had communicated earlier about how each of us felt, maybe we would understand each other better and would talk at this point when each of us needs somebody to lean on.

Communication starts early in any type of relationship that involves two people. Some things are often avoided, being swept under the carpet so as not to cause arguments, but build and are expressed in the wrong way so they get blown out of proportion and stops that communication. Why not say exactly what is on your mind instead of holding back, afraid of the reaction that may become of it?

Regret is a terrible thing to live with, and if there is one thing that I do regret is that I let the communication between my father and I slip through my fingers. I regret never establishing the fact that I wanted to talk with him because he was my dad and never communicating to him the way he hurt me. I held it within and kept the two of us apart and we may never speak again.

I have tried to use this lesson as a learning experience and keep the communication with important people in my life in good standing.

Whether it has been positive, negative or indifferent, I have spoken my mind and done what I could to keep some sort of lines of communication open. I have tried to not let those who are that important to me as, I now realize that my father is more significant to me than I ever thought possible.

Being at college, you will find some of the most influential people and have the most provocative relationships you will have in your life. You may also lose track of other people in your life along the way, some of whose importance in your life you may not yet realize.

Bridges burnt, or ones that feel like they can no longer be crossed again, leave a hollow feeling inside. It is important to convey feelings in an open and honest way that is healthy and can bring people closer together, as opposed to holding emotions in where communication breaks down.

Cinderella on Ice a success at Mullins

By Mark McGrath
Collegian Staff

ICE CAPADES: CINDERELLA
Mullins Center
Feb. 17

What do you get when you combine a classic fairy tale, a sheet of ice and a somewhat backwards wizard named Drazizw? You get Cinderella on Ice which made a stop at the William D. Mullins Center for three days of magic and excitement.

Once again, Ice Capades took a well-known fairy tale to new levels with some timely humor and quite a bit of extravagance. The result was a show that could be enjoyed by adults and children alike. While everyone came to see the skaters and the tale, the memories they took home with them will more likely be the things they would never have expected, like a surprise cameo by the Three Blind Mice or the introduction of Cinderella's strictly platonic male friend, Buttons.

From the moment the wise-cracking Drazizw (that's wizard spelt backwards) stepped onto the ice, the spectators could only wonder what would happen next. After he recited the sacred Wizard's Oath with the help of all his wizarderies in the audience, he started to spin us the tale.

There once was a beautiful girl named Cinderella, and because her babbling and submissive father gave in to all his second wife's demands, she was treated poorly by her stepmother and her abusive "stepsisters," who all wanted a chance to get hooked up with the prince — a character more feminine than they were.

When it was decided that a ball would be held for the indecisive prince to find a wife, everyone was excited except poor Cinderella, who knew that such an event was out of her league. Enter the fairy godmother — who set the stage for a perfect night, but definitely not a late one because as the clock struck 12, the ball came to a halt as the most beautiful dancer rushed out the door, leaving only the fabled glass skate.

Using Marcia Clark-esque deduction, the prince and his court were able to track down Cinderella and reunite the perfect couple. And they all lived happily ever after.

As enchanting as the tale proved to be, the true delight of the evening could be found in the individual characters and the ways in which they were played. While Cinderella and the prince played their parts to fairy tale-ish perfection, the supporting cast was what really made the show move.

Led by the two stepsisters, who were both played by males, Cinderella's so-called family provided much of the comic relief of the evening. Referred to as the "Steroid Sisters," "Evil Stepmonsters" and "King and Kong" by Drazizw throughout the show, they had the audience in stitches.

COURTESY CINDERELLA IN BACS

Elizabeth Manley stars as Cinderella in Mullins Center production.

Almost as funny were the dynamics between Cinderella's timid father and his jealous wife. Just so they would be sure, Drazizw explained to the children in the audience who wore the pants in that family, proving that nothing could be taken for granted in that kingdom.

However, the star of the evening was a character whom most had never even heard of before — Buttons, Cinderella's playmate and only friend. He stuck by her side through good and bad and left only when she was safely in the prince's arms. He was bonded with Cinderella through friendship and love, the two powers that could triumph over evil.

In the end, Drazizw and the audience come to realize that it was those two powers, not his magic, which really made Cinderella such a wonderful tale and shouldn't all fairy tales have a educational ending?

Poet helps celebrate Rosh Chodesh

By Marni E. Hellner
Collegian Staff

Hillel celebrates Rosh Chodesh this evening and poet Merle Feld will help bring in the new month with a poetry reading and talk on Jewish and women's spirituality, and generations.

Feld's presentation, entitled "Sing a New Song: The Poetry of a Jewish Feminist," will be a part of Rosh Chodesh, a holiday for women, held at the beginning of each month of the Hebrew calendar.

Speaking at Hillel House this evening at 8 p.m., Feld is reading from her collection of works with a discussion to follow.

Feld's work can be found in many Jewish prayerbooks and several anthologies including Reading Ruth, an anthology of women's commentaries on the biblical Book of Ruth, and Lifecycles, an anthology by Jewish women about the Jewish lifecycle. Feld has also been published in several Jewish magazines and publications including Lilith and Tikkun.

During the talk, Feld will closely examine Jewish spirituality, women's spirituality and generations.

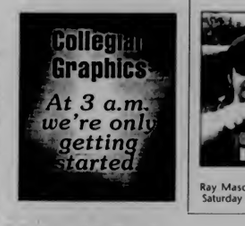
Her discussion of generations will specifically examine the issues surrounding parent-child generation differences.

Feld, well known as a co-founder and facilitator of the Israeli-Palestinian women's dialogue groups on the West Bank and in Jerusalem, has also served as a lecturer and scholar in residence at several universities including Pardes Institute in Jerusalem.

Feld will also speak at Amherst College tomorrow at noon, at Mount Holyoke College at 6 p.m. and at Smith College on Thursday at noon.

All of the events are being sponsored by the Five College Hillel Foundation.

Merle Feld is reading from her poetry and speaking at 8 p.m. tonight in Hillel House. The talk is free and open to the public. For more information, please call Hillel House at 549-1710.



Local release is Red Hot

RED HOT RELEASE PARTY
The Grotto
Feb. 17

NORTHAMPTON — The Northampton music scene came alive Saturday night as eight local acts took to the intimate Grotto stage in celebration of the release of the Red Hot cassette compilation. Each band contributed 20-minute sets, just enough time to strut their stuff.

Pangloss, hailing from Westfield, headlined the show with an impressive but far too brief set. The band has evolved from a semi-generic punk band to one of the most intriguing acts around with their double female lead vocals.

Fresh off their opening slot for Yo La Tengo, the Ray Mason Band brought their delightful classic pop sensibilities to the stage. Bringing back memories of rock acts from the '60s Mason led his trio through a polished exciting set of music. Their tune "Everly" is a stand out on the Red Hot compilation.

In the middle of the set, Tizzy and Pirate Jenny, proved why they are two of the most popular acts in the area. Pirate Jenny are led by Amy Greene and Aimee Swift who coordinated the compilation release as well as the concert. Their set also proved to be one of many highlights of the night.

Tizzy, though limited by the size of the stage, put on the most energetic set of the evening. As always they displayed their tight songwriting and social stage presence.

Based out of Middletown, Conn. Stringbean may not be a local band but their sound and style fit perfectly into the Northampton sound with their catchy hooks and bouncy melodies. Encyclopedia Brown, in a rare live performance, mixed up straight ahead pop songs with bursts of noisy guitar feedback. The highlight "Spaceship" also appears on the compilation tape.

Campus favorite's The Mitchells got the crowd dancing around with their bouncy guitar tunes. Semi-hits like "Under Water" and "Tollbox" proved why the Mitchells are one of the best University of Massachusetts bands.

The show got started with Diane Davies and her politically aware electric folk songs. Look for an upcoming cassette of Davies on Red Hot. Overall the evening was the brightest night in local music in ages. Both the compilation cassette and this show should help resurrect the local music scene that has been faltering for quite some time.

UMass a disappointing third at A–10s

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

If there was one thing that the Massachusetts men's indoor track and field team learned this weekend at the Atlantic–10 Championship meet, it was that you have to take the good with the bad.

Good (for UMass): The Virginia Tech squad, favored to win the championship, was snowed in at the airport in Roanoke,Va., and was unable to attend the meet.

"We left pretty bad for them because we had the same thing happen to us two years ago," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

Bad: LaSalle University made it to Mackal Field House in Rhode Island without a problem, and along with the host Rams, outscored the Minutemen who had to settle for third place — the best finish in the history of men's indoor track, surpassing last year's fourth place.

Good: Massachusetts freshman Alberto Vasquez set a school record in the pole vault, clearing the bar at 14–feet–9 inches, eclipsing Paul Doyle's mark of 14–feet–6 inches set in 1994. Vasquez, from Green Brook, NJ, was one of six Minutemen to notch a second place finish while UMass took 28 places in the 19 events, the most places by any team at the meet.

Bad: Out of the 28 places, O'Brien's squad (125 points) was unable to muster a first–place finish. LaSalle (145) posted eight first place finishes, Rhode Island (131) had five.

"I still have a lingering feeling of discouragement because I think [the championship] was within our grasp," O'Brien said. "It's tough to overcome no first place points; that's a big gap."

Good: Fourteen Massachusetts athletes recorded season– best performances with Scott Price, Chris Conner and Ethan Nedeau qualifying for the New England Championship next weekend.

Bad: Thirteen Minutemen turned in performances below their A–10 rankings previous to the meet including a melt down by Matt Ely in the 800 meters and an uninspired run by the distance medley relay foursome.

Scott Price

Good: All three of O'Brien's entrants in the triple jump placed. Andre Roach took third, Brandon Tutt took fourth for the second consecutive year and Alex Ampontuah placed fifth.

Bad: Out of the three UMass runners that were entered in the 200m race, freshman star Tom Toye was the only one to place, coming in third behind two Rhode Island sprinters. Price, a sophomore, and junior Chris Abbott posted season–best times but were kept out of the top six.

Good: Sophomore Ryan Carrara virtually came out of nowhere to finish second in the 5000m event, recording a season–best time of 15:17.36.

Bad: Nobody else came out of anywhere.

Good: O'Brien is sending 18 individuals and three relay teams to compete in the New England Championship meet in Boston. Ron Tauro, who placed second in the hurdles and fourth in the high jump at A–10s, will be competing in both of those events on top of the pentathlon.

Bad: The Minutemen will have no extra rest as the meet will be held Feb. 23–24.

Overall, O'Brien was marginally discouraged with the outcome of the meet, but he expects a resurgence at the New England Championships.

"We've taken the first step in terms of our championship meets," O'Brien said. "We will [learn] a lesson from the disappointment, and gear up for a far superior performance this coming weekend."

Minutewomen win in second half rout

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachus. s women's basketball team extended its five game winning streak this weekend, as the Minutewomen held Fordham to just nine second half points in defeating the Lady Rams, 62–34.

UMass (17–7, 9–4 in the Atlantic 10) had three players score in double figures, as Melissa Gurile and Crystal Carroll led the attack with 18 points apiece. Gurile recorded her fifth double–double of the season, grabbing 11 rebounds.

Both teams suffered an early scoring drought, with UMass the first to break through, scoring nearly four minutes into the game. The Minutewomen carried the lead to 8–0, before Fordham (8–14, 2–11 A–10) got on the to make it 8–3 with 12:58 left in the half.

Massachusetts built its lead as large as 10 points, but the Lady Rams shot .545 percent (6–11) from three–point range to stay in the game. Fordham, using its long range bombing, went to the locker room within two points of UMass, 27–25.

Massachusetts stepped up its defense in the second half, holding the Lady Rams to just nine points and only one bucket from behind the arc. The Minutewomen shot 14–26 in the second half, while the Lady Rams were stifled to a .255 shooting percentage.

UMass finished off Fordham, winning by a 28–point margin. The 34 points that Fordham scored is the lowest point total for any UMass opponent this season.

Gurile was the leading offensive threat for the Minutewomen. She not only produced her double–double, she also shot 4–for–5 from the free throw line, and notched four blocked shots, while only picking up one foul. Of her 11 rebounds, Gurile had seven on the defensive boards.

Carroll also crashed the boards, pulling down six defensive rebounds. Like Gurile she knocked down four from the charity stripe. In addition, Carroll had a block and a steal.

Senior co–captain Octavia Thomas scored 10 points in the victory, while recording three steals. Sabriya Mitchell kicked in five points and recorded three assists. Mitchell also came away with two steals.

Freshman Iaywana Bradley continued to earn valuable playing time, coming off the bench to score four points.

Fordham was led by Amy Hauser, who came off the bench to score 11 points. Hauser was the only Lady Ram in double figures, as no one in the starting five scored more than three points. Fordham's next highest scorer was Rachelle Racht, who tallied six points.

The Minutewomen will stop in Dayton tomorrow as they continue their three game road trip.

Iverson upstages Allen, Georgetown drubs UConn

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

LANDOVER, Md. — Georgetown did things no one had done to Connecticut since November.

The 11th–ranked Hoyas ended the third–ranked Huskies' 23–game winning streak and chance at a perfect Big East season with a devastating 77–65 victory Monday night.

"For the first time a team attacked us and we didn't respond," Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun said. "We expected the challenge from a very good team, thought we could meet it and obviously didn't."

Georgetown (22–5, 11–4 Big East), which was led by Allen Iverson's 26 points and eight steals, did it the way it used to in the old days - with a suffocating defense so good that even Ray Allen had one of his worst games of the season.

"Allen plays both ends of the court extremely hard," Georgetown coach John Thompson said of the 6–foot Iverson. "He did a good job."

The Huskies (24–2, 14–1) last lost to Iowa in the semifinals of the season–opening Great Alaska Shootout. Their start matched the best ever in the Big East. St. John's went 14–0 in 1984–85 and Georgetown ended that run as well.

A 16–1 burst gave the Hoyas a 30–12 lead with 9:43 left in the first half. The Huskies had 12 turnovers at halftime and Allen, second only to Iverson in the league scoring race, was 1–for–9 at halftime with two points. It wasn't just one Georgetown player who stopped Allen.

Boubacar Aw, Iverson, Victor Page and Jerry Nichols all covered him. And there was plenty of help. Every time Allen went around a screen, there was another player waiting for him.

"I think Boubacar and Jerry Nichols did a great job on him. Everybody else did a great job of helping out when he came down on transition," Iverson said of Allen. "We just wanted to come in here and play our style of basketball, and that's real hard defense. Boubacar set the tempo for us."

Allen finished with 13 points on 5–for–18 shooting.

"Ray has been played tough before in a lot of games, and great players are going to get played that way," Calhoun said. "Ray had to find a way to get free. He just didn't have a good game. I don't think he had a good game at either end."

"They just stunned us. They got down on us," Allen said. "I remember they scored one of the first baskets and we just turned around and they were in our faces and took us by surprise."

The Hoyas led 43–31 at halftime and the sellout crowd of 19,035 at USAir Arena had a sense the Huskies weren't done as they had never trailed in the second half during the winning streak. Iverson took care of that quickly.

He scored the first points of the second half on a dunk where he went down the lane over teammates and opponents alike. He was fouled on the play and Calhoun was forced to call a timeout just 47 seconds into the second half. A 7–0 run that made it 55–36 with 16:09 left had Calhoun calling a second timeout.

once more for the duration of the game.

When asked if playing close games to a lesser opponent's level wurried him, Calipari summed up his team this way.

"Did you see the Temple games," the UMass coach said of his teams two 20–plus point wins over their arch rivals. "Did you watch today's game?"

"We're fine."

Rhode Island preview: There's no rest for the top ranked Minutemen, who travel to the Providence Civic Center tonight to face the Rhode Island Rams (15–8, 7–5), tip–off is scheduled for 8:30 p.m.

These two teams met once already this year, a 77–71 win at the Mullins Center. That was one of the four games which Camby sat out after his collapse. URI coach Al Skinner said that this would be a different game than the Jan. 17 contest.

"It will be different from the first game because he brings another dimension," Skinner said. "He's probably the best player in college basketball and possesses some different challenges to us."

Calipari had plenty of praise for this Ram team and its star freshman Antonio Reynolds (11 pts, 8.5 rebounds a game).

"This is probably [URI's] best team in a few years. That freshman is outstanding. I love him. He's a warrior and can really go. Its going to be a hard game for us to win. We know that building is going to be filled."

The Minutewomen also recorded a win in the 1000m, as Jen Waeger captured the event with a run of 2:58.35. Cheryl Lyons took sixth in the event, finishing in a time of 3:05.10. Waeger also finished just behind Donaghue in the mile, clocking a 4:56.50.

In the 3000m, Christy Martin (10:20.28) and Kristin Donaldson (10:40.34) took third and fifth for UMass.

In the field events, Stephanie Townson, Christie Marrth, and Shana Mitchell took third through fifth respectively in the 20 pound weight throw. Martin took fourth and Townson finished sixth in the shot put. Nicole Way took home the crown in the triple jump, posting a mark of 37–1. Alyssa Angers took sixth.

The Minutewomen will next compete in the New England Championships at Bowdoin College Saturday and Sunday.

Minutemen looking to clinch playoff berth

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — In the grand scheme of things a tie, even with the extra point for a shootout victory, is rarely too momentous.

For the Massachusetts hockey team however, Saturday's 4–4 tie (UMass won the shootout 2–1) with New Hampshire was a significant one.

The three points combined with the 7–6 loss that UMass– Lowell dealt Merrimack, put the Minutemen just two points away from clinching a playoff berth. For the Warriors to get in, the Minutemen would have to lose all four of their remaining games, and Merrimack would have to win both of its remaining games.

The latter might not seem that difficult, until you factor in that the Warriors face No. 2 Boston University Friday night.

"If they have some success in the next two games then we have to have a bit more success," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said. "But by virtue of winning the play–in game last year, for us to be able to make the playoffs two years in a row, even in eighth place is a great step for the program."

Having pushed Merrimack to the brink, the Minutemen can start looking upward.

Looming just nine points above them is New Hampshire. In the tie, the Wildcats proved to be vulnerable, and if the Minutemen could defeat them tomorrow night (7 p.m.) at the William D. Mullins Center then the lead would be cut to four.

After that game, both teams have three remaining games on their conference schedule.

UMass plays Providence next Saturday, and BC and Northeastern in the seasons's final weekend. All three games are at home.

New Hampshire will also face BC and Providence, but will also take on lowly Merrimack in its final game.

If UMass can defeat UNH, and come away with wins in all three final contests, with UNH losing at least one of its last three, then the Minutemen would move into the No. 7 seed for the conference playoffs.

The difference between being No. 7 and No. 8 is enormous. While the No. 8 seed looks to be headed for an early spring when it faces national powerhouse BU, the No. 7 seed has a chance to make the ground hog look the other way against No. 2 Lowell.

The Minutemen are 1–1–1 on the season with the branch campus and captured the shootout from Lowell in the final game.

"We're going in Tuesday night, looking to steal five more points," said senior forward Sal Manganaro. "We play the teams ahead of us after that and we're going in trying to move up."

The tie was significant for another reason as well. Heading into the season, the Minutemen had only been able to muster points against three (Maine, Providence, BC) of Hockey East's other eight programs.

This season, Mallen wanted to add to that. While any success against national powerhouse Boston University has remained just out of Massachusetts' reach, the Minutemen had been able to add three teams to last years list.

Last night UMass added one more.

"In our first two years in the league now, we've beaten or tied each team in the league at least once, with the exception of BU," Mallen said.

New Hampshire's State U had dominated it's neighbors to the southwest by scores of 7–1, 6–3 and 6–3 last year and crushed UMass 7–2 just two weeks ago, making the difference between the seventh and eighth place spots look huge.

But last night the Minutemen took a stand in only their third season and outplayed the Wildcats, and thus gave themselves a chance to move either further up the Hockey East ladder.

The Minutemen have been causing havoc against their conference rivals, and are within two points of clinching a spot in the Hockey East playoffs.

Brian LaRochelle's right shoulder. The goal gave Perry his 80th career point, tying him for 10th on the UMass all–time point list.

Massachusetts increased its lead to 2–0 just over two minutes later on a goal by Dan Juden. After a scramble in front of the net, Juden knocked home a goal off a rebound of a Rob Bonneau shot.

UNH tallied its first goal of the night on the power play, while Tom O'Connor served a UMass penalty for too many men on the ice. Mike Sullivan beat Brian Regan, converting a Mark Mowers pass on a two–on–one break.

Each team would net another goal before the intermission, as Jon Jacques lifted the puck over a falling LaRochelle for a 3–1 UMass lead. Eric Nickulas fired a slapshot from the top of the left circle to bring UNH within one.

Norris notched the only score of the second period, as he stole the clearing pass and shot it past a stumbling LaRochelle.

New Hampshire narrowed the UMass lead to one when Boguniecki fired a shot from the right face–off circle which beat Regan to the short side. He notched his second tally of the night with a fluke shot which tied the game.

With 6:23 left in the game, Boguniecki fired a shot which careened off several skates. The shot resembled a pinball machine, bouncing off skates at bad angles and rendering Regan helpless.

"I think it hit off of two people's skates," Mallen said. "It's unfortunate that it happened at that time in the game."

With 15 seconds remaining in the game, Blair Wagar couldn't convert on a chance to put the game away for UMass, shooting the puck just wide of the New Hampshire cage.

Regan was spectacular in goal for the Minutemen, stopping 35 shots in the game, four in the extra period. Regan also turned back three shots in the shootout to preserve the UMass shootout victory.

"[Regan] played solid," Mallen said. "I thought he gave us a real good performance. The shootout really kind of put an exclamation point on it. That's a clutch situation."

"I love them," Regan said of the shootout. "That's why I want to be a goalie."

Camby runs wild against Hokies

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

BLACKSBURG, Va. — After compiling 31 points, 10 rebounds and five blocked shots in the Massachusetts men's basketball team's 74-58 win over Virginia Tech, Minuteman center Marcus Camby was asked to rate his performance that day.

"It was about average," Camby replied.

His coach, John Calipari, summed up the reaction to that statement best with his retort.

"That a tough statement," Calipari said with a wide smile. "I hope he's right."

The rest of the college basketball world better hope he's wrong or the talk of an undefeated season could be a serious reality, as the Minutemen disposed of the 10th ranked team in America at Cassell's Coliseum in front of 10,052 frenzied Hokie fans.

Every possible motivational factor for Virginia Tech, such as everyone who entered getting a burnt orange pom pom, to the presentation of the Sugar Bowl trophy at halftime was implemented, but none of that could defend UMass' (25-0, 13-0 Atlantic 10) Player of the Year candidate.

"He's a point guard in a center's body," Virginia Tech coach Bill Foster said. "That impossible to defend, if you try and defense him with speed he'll go over you and if you put a body on him, he can blow by you."

Camby was supported in the win mightily by the play of co-captains Donta Bright and Dana Dingle. Bright scored 19 points on the day making many shots from the perimeter to open up the baseline and block for the 6-foot-11 Hartford native.

Dingle was outstanding on the defensive end, holding vaunted Hokie forward Ace Custis to 3-for-13 shooting from the floor for only seven points.

"We challenged Dana to play a great defensive game," Calipari said. "Because Ace Custis as good of a player as we've played. I said 'I want to see how good you really are.' And he did a great job on Ace."

Bright agreed with his coach saying, "Dana showed everyone how good a defender his is."

Although the Minutemen dominated on the front line, including a 37-22 rebounding edge, the backcourt play of Damon Watlington (Hokie high scorer with 17) kept Virginia Tech (19-3, 10-2) close most of the way.

Watlington sparked the Hokies early success by figuring in six of their first 10 points. That 10-9 lead would be the last for his club for the day.

UMass then went on a quick 10-2 run to go up seven and the lead would go as low as three only

Virginia Tech & UMass could be next big rivalry

By Candire Flemming
Collegian Staff

BLACKSBURG, Va. — The scenario: Crazy fans camping out in harsh weather for tickets a week early, the two top Atlantic 10 teams, which both just happen to be in the top 10 nationally, going at it in front of a sold-out arena on national television.

Sounds a lot like a Massachusetts-Temple game, right?

Nope, it sounds a lot like what could become the newest great rivalry in the A-10 — UMass vs. Virginia Tech.

Whenever the Minutemen face the Owls, fans wait for hours and hours in frigid weather to get their tickets, much like Hokies fans camped out in tents when the tickets for this game went on sale.

Whenever the Minutemen face the Owls, the game is extremely hyped up and greatly anticipated, often marked on the calendar at the beginning of the season.

When the schedules came out at the beginning of this season, the first game that many people looked for was the UMass-Virginia Tech game — where and when it would be played.

In fact, Hokie coach Bill Foster thought the UMass game was too hyped up.

Whenever the Minutemen face the Owls, it is usually a hard-fought battle that isn't decided until the last few minutes. In Saturday's matchup between the Hokies and UMass it was a battle, and the outcome wasn't completely decided until there was less than four minutes left in the contest.

And then there was the atmosphere.

The atmosphere at a UMass-Temple game is always electric, whether it is played at the Mullins Center or McGonigle Hall.

The fans are loud and out-of-control, and the arenas are filled to capacity.

Virginia Tech's Cassell Coliseum was indeed electric and was completely filled — with 10,052 people.

"This building was as loud and as electric as any building we've been in," Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "That was a college environment at its best. Your talking about the way college athletics should be. When you come into an environment like that, [it's tough]."

The Hokies at the Coliseum, much like the Owls at McGonigle Hall and the Minutemen at Mullins, are hard to beat holding an all-time winning percentage of .818 (341 wins in 417 games), and had entered the game with a 17 home-game winning streak.

In any UMass-Temple matchup, the crowd never sits down and never keeps quiet, yelling and screaming on every single play, much like the raucous crowd at Saturday's game at Cassell Coliseum.

"We heard about how rowdy this crowd was, just like [the crowds at] Temple, St. Joe's and St. Bonaventure," UMass center Marcus Camby said.

"It was just like a NCAA-type game, the atmosphere," Virginia Tech forward Shawn Smith said.

With the similarities between the UMass-Temple rivalry and the UMass-Virginia Tech game on Saturday evident, a new A-10 rival for the Minutemen seems ready to emerge.

"I think [UMass-VaTech] will develop into some good games," Foster said. "We've only had two [games] like [Saturday's]. The playoff game last year in the NIT was the same atmosphere. I think [UMass-VaTech] could develop into a good rivalry."

Regan shines, UMass ties UNH

By Casey Kane

DURHAM, N.H. — When the Massachusetts hockey team looked at its schedule last week, the players knew that the home-and-home series with New Hampshire would be a chance for the Minutemen to gain some ground on the Wildcats, the team which currently sits above them in the Hockey East standings.

For the second time in two weeks, the UMass squad faced a shootout, after being tied 4-4 at the end of regulation and a scoreless extra period. And for the second time, the Minutemen walked away victorious.

The Minutemen (10-16-3 overall, 4-13-3 Hockey East) looked to be headed toward a victory, but a fluke goal late in the tied the score at 4-4, to force overtime with the Wildcats (10-15-3, 6-11-3).

The teams will meet tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center to play the game postponed by snow on Friday night.

Sal Manganaro and Warren Norris each netted goals to give UMass the shootout win, 2-1, while Eric Boguniecki scored the lone Wildcat goal.

Each team receives two points in the standings for the tie, with UMass getting an extra point for the shootout victory.

"The first shootout we had [against Northeastern] we were not ready," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "Now, we had success on it. We feel like we have more experience. A little more experience goes a long way in winning a tight game."

The Minutemen got on the board first, 4:58 into the game, when Tom Perry fired a pass from Norris over

UMass women run off with A-10 title

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

A- has been the case for much of the season, the Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team was led this weekend by a quartet of powerful racers Saturday. And while the outcome of individual races was familiar, the overall result was not.

Behind exceptional performances from Rebecca Donaghue, Nicole Roberts, Rosey Bryan, and Anya Forrest, the Minutewomen captured their first ever Atlantic 10 Championship.

Massachusetts scored 158 points to win the meet, while host Rhode Island took second with 124. Temple finished third with a score of 84. Fordham (53) and LaSalle (49) rounded out the top five.

Donaghue won a pair of events and was a part of the championship 4x800m relay. The sophomore clocked a 4:55.19 to capture the mile. That time set a new A-10 Championship meet record. With a time of 2:16.48, she took also top honors in the 800m. Donaghue completed her trio of firsts, running the third leg of the winning 4x800m relay, which recorded a time of 9:26.96.

Donaghue has had an outstanding season thus far, having provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships in the mile and for ECACs in the 800m and 3000m.

Roberts also set a meet record by winning the 400m in a time of 57.64 seconds. In addition, Roberts took home a second in the 200m, in a time of 25.71 seconds, and ran the third leg of the fourth place, 4x400m relay.

Bryan ran the gamut of medals, taking a first, second, and third on the day. With a mark of 18-4 1/2, Bryan captured the championship in the long jump. Leaping 36-10 1/4, she took second in the triple jump. The sophomore posted a time of 8.29 seconds to take third in the 55m hurdles. She finished out her performance on the afternoon, finishing sixth in the 200m with a time of 26.34 seconds.

Anya Forrest destroyed her own UMass record in the 55m hurdles, winning the event in 8.06 seconds. Forrest, an ECAC qualifier in the hurdles, held the record for the event (8.16) entering this season, and she broke that with a

Buchanan wins big in New Hampshire as Dole fails again

By John King
Associated Press

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Conservative rebel Pat Buchanan won a narrow victory yesterday in New Hampshire's leadoff presidential primary nudging Bob Dole from his perch as Republican front-runner and throwing the GOP race into three-way turmoil.

Late-charging Lamar Alexander, the former Tennessee governor, ran a close third and suggested that proved him a stronger mainstream alternative to Buchanan than "a weakened Senator Dole."

Today, the candidates were launching immediately into a five-week, 30-state burst of primary contests.

Dole was headed to the Dakotas; Alexander looked South, to Georgia and South Carolina, hoping his Tennessee roots would translate into regional strength.

For Buchanan, the commentator-turned-candidate, it was another dramatic New Hampshire night. Four years ago, he scored 37 percent against an incumbent GOP president here, asserting himself — and his often unorthodox views — in national Republican politics. With 91 percent of precincts counted, Buchanan had 51,469 votes, or 27 percent, to 49,648 or 26 percent for Dole. Alexander had 43,600, 23 percent, publishing their Steve Forbes was a distant fourth at 12 percent, and said by associates to be reassessing his campaign but certain to press on for another week because of his strength in Arizona and Delaware.

In exit polls, voters cited pocketbook issues — jobs, taxes and budget deficits — as they judged the eight-man Republican field. Asked which issue mattered most in deciding how they voted, one in four cited the economy and jobs and one in five cited taxes. Roughly 15 percent said the federal budget deficit. In clear reflection of the race's volatility, 60 percent said they settled on their choice in the final week.

President Clinton swept to overwhelming victory in the Democratic primary, logging more than 90 percent of the vote against token opposition. The fractures in the Republican field gave Clinton and his party even more to celebrate. "The answer is not to divide the American people," Clinton said in a victory statement that offered his view of the Republican race.

New Hampshire's results were likely to winnow the GOP field, though none of the struggling candidates would immediately admit as much. Forbes, particularly, had to be disappointed. He had been tied for the New Hampshire lead a month ago but his effort to promote a flat income tax wilted as moderate voters chose between Dole and Alexander.

Red Cross asking for donations

By Jessica Charlebois
Collegian Correspondent

Every 10 seconds someone in the nation needs blood, someone with leukemia, injured children with hemophilia, an infant who was born prematurely, a burn victim or maybe a friend in a car accident.

For the past 50 years, the American Red Cross has been helping people like these, but they have never been able to do it alone. Hundreds of volunteers are in need to give blood, and blood drives are frequently held to maintain the supply.

The Red Cross said it targets universities because many students tend to give blood. The blood donated by students at the University of Massachusetts alone constitutes 30 percent of the blood supply in New England.

In New England alone, "1100 units of blood are needed every day just to maintain an adequate blood supply," said Iddi Liquornik, recruiter for the New England Region Blood Services. "Donating just once can save up to three lives."

After donating, blood collected in this area is sent to Dedham, where it is tested. Its components and plasma are separated and labeled according to blood type, and are stored at appropriate temperatures. This allows over 170 hospitals to be supplied and hundreds of patients aided.

The Red Cross will make two attempts to notify a donor if they find something wrong with the blood — such as HIV or some other illness/infection. According to the Red Cross, this is why it is important to always give blood under the same name, social security number and address.

The Red Cross refers those concerned about their blood to the appropriate places where they can be tested, and ask that their drives not to be used as testing site.

Herbert Wood, a frequent volunteer of the blood drives, expressed a sincere dedication in his philosophy about the community and the commodity of blood.

"Not everyone gets to be where you are," he said. "Accept the responsibilities that go along with it and give something back, don't just take. There is an infinite number of ways to give something back and this is just one of them, that's what its all about."

The Blood Drive will take place on Feb. 20, 28 and 29. Donors may give every 56 days, must be at least 110 lbs. and must be in good health.

People's Market not just a food source

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

The People's Market provides the University with an alternative eating place which promotes the co-operative and collective movement. It also educates and informs the community about nutritional, political and social issues in the realm of the food industry.

"Besides being an alternative, inexpensive, non-profit, natural food store," said senior Justine Bramble, "We also promote social justice and increase environmental and political consciousness."

"We are here for us," stated senior Chris Olson, "We provide a service to the students which the University does not provide."

"People's Market educates the public by making them aware of issues," states junior Alessandro Stroscio. "For instance, on Yom Kippur, we did not play any music to show respect for the holiday."

The Market was founded on the principles of a co- operative — an organization owned by all of its members — yet it can not fully function as a co-op because the University owns it.

Even though UMass owns People's Market, the store philosophically operates under the principles of a worker owned collective — a co-op in which all of the work is done by the people who own the capitol.

Participatory management and consensus decision making are also employed by People's Market. Participatory management allows the 27 members of the Market to make decisions. Also, 100 percent agreement must be reached before any important changes take place.

"Because of our participatory management and our consensus decision making, improvements are always being made through a large amount of feedback and ideas," said sophomore Michael Gearin.

People's Market sells coffee, bagels, organic produce, vegan products, dried fruits, sandwiches and many other items according to strict guidelines.

Junior Karie Sullivan said, "We do not sell any products that directly or indirectly cause suffering or oppression to anyone.

"We are always trying to diversify our products to meet the wants and the needs of the campus community."

Bramble said "working for People's is a huge commitment, all 27 members run for positions on two to six of our 16 committees."

The Steering Committee, which consists of five members who are elected by a majority vote at the end of each semester, deals with the policies, firing, controversies, purchasing of equipment, and general management of the market. All proposals made by the Committee are discussed and voted upon in weekly all-staff meetings.

Bramble said the Market has served as a very valuable co- curricular experience.

"By working at People's I get out beyond the classroom setting. I have learned management skills, leadership styles and business information, which I could not learn in the classroom," she said.

Gearin agreed, "People leave here with extensive knowledge about how to run a small business."

Senior Yolima Romero stressed the importance of the co- curricular experience compared to the classroom environment. "We learn real life skills by working at a student business. We apply the information which we learn in our classes, and more importantly, we gain knowledge which we could not even learn in the classroom."

Bramble also spoke of the importance of receiving more funds from the school.

"The Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) needs relief from the University in order for student businesses and registered student organizations to stabilize and then improve."

Du Bois' radicalism forgotten

Communist party member says other side of leaders ignored

By Michael Elliott and Shea Brown
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the official dedication of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, Joe Sims of the Communist Party USA emphasized that Du Bois' radical roots should not be forgotten amidst this weeks ceremonies.

Sims, a member of the Communist Party USA and the editor of Political Affairs, the party journal, delivered a lecture entitled "the Revolutionary Legacy of W.E.B. Du Bois: Scholar Freedom Fighter, Communist," at the library yesterday night.

Sims said that Du Bois is simultaneously one of the most important and misunderstood thinkers of the 20th century.

"We should be careful that having found Du Bois, we should not lose him," said Sims.

Du Bois' radical message has become marginalized in the past decades, according to Sims.

"There is a danger when great black leaders become famous that they lose some of the important meanings" of their message, Sims said.

In the case of Du Bois, history has presented "watered down versions" of his accomplishments that are "more acceptable to the status-quo," he said.

Du Bois, who died a member of the American Communist Party and spent much of his life fighting the forces of racism and imperialism in the U.S. and abroad, should be remembered "for his revolutionary character that was the epitome and highest expression of his life," said Sims.

Sims cited more recent examples in the cases of Martin Luther King, Jr. and Malcolm X where their struggles were convoluted by America's unwillingness to accept more militant aspects of their ideology.

The national holiday which celebrates the life of King presents a "sanitized version" of the famous civil rights leader, said Sims.

Many forget King's opposition to the war in Vietnam, Sims said — a stance that he was considerably criticized for. The vast commercialization of Malcolm X as seen in shirts and hats which followed the release of Spike Lee's movie concerned Sims as well.

"Nobody seems to know the militant Malcolm, the fighting Malcolm," said Sims.

Throughout his life, Du Bois consistently took stands against the conventional wisdom of his time, said Sims.

In the 1890s, when Booker T. Washington was preaching the "pull yourself up by your boot-straps remedy," to black America, said Sims, Du Bois sought a expanded approach towards equality and liberation, one which "totally rejected Washington's acceptance of racism" and embraced ideologies of struggle, said Sims.

Du Bois proved pivotal in the formation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and was active in the Pan-African Movement.

"He set in motion forces which would later change the world," said Sims.

Du Bois rejected capitalism in the aggressive form it had taken in the early 1900's, said Sims, and actively supported communist revolutions in Russia and China.

"The older he got, the more radical he became," Sims said.

At the age of 83, Du Bois was arrested for failing to register as a foreign agent with the U.S. Department of Treasury because of his affiliation with a world-wide peace organization which the government at the time considered to be a subversive Communist movement, said Sims.

Under the pressure of McCarthy era anti-Communism fervor, Du Bois refused to buckle under the pressure placed upon him, said Sims.

"He did what was right, and at the most difficult time," Sims said. "He was showing us a light."

"He left us with a legacy of struggle, truth, courage and conviction," concluded Sims.

Mad Dasher notes increase in output

By Kathryn Shepardson
Collegian Correspondent

As exams steadily approach, many of us can breathe a little easier thanks to Mad Dasher Notes, a notetaking service that has moved to a new on-campus location in the Newman Center.

Mad Dasher sells students transcribed lecture material. With first-hand experience in large lecture classes, Mad Dasher owners and University of Massachusetts alumni Kerry Olson and Josh Lebow quickly caught on to the business which originated in North Carolina and Colorado.

"As soon as I realized what Mahar Auditorium and the rest of the lecture halls were like, I started choosing [to take] honors classes, or classes with under 20 students," said Olson, a former English and social thought and political economy (STPEC) major, "however many people in biology, psychology or communications really don't have that choice, they have to deal with the large lecture halls."

Notetakers are responsible for recording weekly lecture material. Students can view lecture notes before purchasing packets which run anywhere from $8 to $12 per exam.

The notes are available on reserve in the library, and some packets are given to learning disabled students, according to Lebow.

"I think the note service is a great idea," said junior BDIC major Chris Sergeant. "I bought a couple packets last semester to compare them to the notes I took in class, they helped clarify information and catch me up on what I missed."

While many of the larger classes attract student buyers, there are no

Library kicks off celebrations

W.E.B. Du Bois library starts week of events with dedication

RYAN S. TEZZI/COLLEGIAN

Panelists John Bracey, Robert Paynter, and Peter Lau speak of W.E.B. Du Bois at a student/faculty teach-in in the campus center yesterday afternoon.

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

An small group gathered yesterday afternoon to learn about the life and history of W.E.B. Du Bois. The event is the first of many which will be held this week at the university in honor of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library Dedication Celebration.

The Teach-In began with a viewing of the documentary entitled W.E.B. Du Bois of Great Barrington. The documentary described Du Bois as one the leading intellectuals of his time.

Born in Great Barrington, Mass., Du Bois's great grandfather was brought to the north by a Dutch slavetrader. He was later freed because he served in the Revolutionary army.

Du Bois had shown academic excellence throughout his high school years. When he was 16 years old, his mother died and the town community raised funds to send him to Fiske University. It was at Fiske that Du Bois first saw the poverty of the African Americans in the south. He taught African-American school children during his summers while at Fiske. He later studied at Harvard University.

Du Bois wrote prolifically throughout his life, including such works as, The Souls of Black Folk, and Philadelphia Negro, among many others.

At the age of 92 he was asked by the Ghanian president to edit the Encyclopedia Africana. Du Bois would not live to see this work published. He died on the eve of the March on Washington, where Martin Luther King gave his I Have a Dream speech.

David Levering Lewis, author of W.E.B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868-1909, said, "Du Bois was more radical at [age] 90 than he was at [age] 20."

Following the documentary a panel of graduate students and professors spoke about the works and the personal history of Du Bois.

Professor John Bracey spoke on how Du Bois grew up in a time of post slavery. Bracey said that the majority of the African Americans at this time did not personally experience slavery. This, combined with the "massive industrialization and urbanization" in New England led to the circumstances and the society in which Du Bois would grow up.

"I don't think there is any other book since the anti-bellum period that comes anywhere close to The Souls of Black Folk, that lays out the problems of an industrial society," said Bracey.

Bracey also spoke of Du Bois's work, Philadelphia Negro, how he was hired to investigate the race question in Philadelphia. Du Bois surveyed 4,000 African Americans in Philadelphia Philadelphia Negro became a major example of "empirical sociological study." Bracey said, "Its a key work in Du Bois's developing Opus, and he's only about thirty."

David Blight, a historian from Amherst College, now in the process of editing a new edition of The Souls of Black Folk, spoke about his upcoming book. He plans to write his introduction of Du Bois's book as seen from the point of view of an American tragedy. Blight also plans to add letters written to Du Bois in response to his book.

The Teach-In was sponsored by the Black Graduate Students Association, a second Teach-In will be held in the Campus Center today at 2 p.m.

Craft Center offers photography class

By Isabelle Fisher
Collegian Correspondent

The Craft Center is offering a "How to Use Your Camera" workshop on Saturday, Feb. 24 from 11 a.m.-3 p.m. at the Craft Center for anyone who is interested in photography or wants to learn how to take better pictures.

For $6 participants can learn how to take better pictures, understand exposure and develop film. Necessary supplies include a camera with manual functions — not a point and shoot camera — and a roll of film.

The objective of the workshop is to learn to take better pictures through hands-on experience. Once the photos are developed the group can discuss how they can be improved.

The workshops are very individualized; each person will learn how to use their own camera effectively, as well as learning about their personal strengths and weaknesses. The classes are small allowing all levels of photographers to work at their own pace.

Since this is the first time the workshop is offered, a lot of the process will be trial and error to see what works best, according to the organizers. The instructors hope to meet with everyone again to evaluate the progress.

The workshop will be taught by Joe DiSanto and Bill Porter, employees at the Craft Center. Both have been photographers since high school and have studied photography abroad. DiSanto is a pre-med student with an art minor and has been involved with photography workshops for two years. Porter is a computer arts major and currently has a photography show at the Council of Fine Arts, in Queens, N.Y. entitled "Old Ireland."

DiSanto and Porter will teach about black and white photography using the zone system. This method, made famous by Ansel Adams, breaks down black, white and shades of grey into 10 zones. The 10 zones are used to calculate different exposure. If there is interest, they may do some work in color, they said.

The Craft Center will be offering many more workshops at all levels, and ranging from three weeks to one day long. They are also trying to offer more Saturday workshops.

One idea which DiSanto is trying to organize is a week end Nature Photography Outing. This would be offered to more advanced photographers as a camping weekend where picture would be taken on a certain topic.

Although budget cuts are putting some strains on the Craft Center, new workshops are being offered. It already has 1200 members, and always welcomes people to become involved.

"Many people are interested in the Arts, but art classes fill up fast. The Craft Center is an alternative for those who want to get involved," said DiSanto.

If you would like to sign up for a workshop you can stop by the Craft Center located in the Student Union.

AIDS research in chimpanzees draw

By Melanie B. Arruda
Collegian Staff

Animal advocates across the country have contacted the In Defense of Animals (IDA) office in outrage about the first chimpanzee to develop AIDS-related illness at Yerkes Regional Primate Research Center. Chimpanzees are the only animals who can maintain the HIV virus in their bodies.

"I believe that this success will be completely insignificant to the thousands of humans suffering with AIDS," said IDA coordinator Dr. Sheri Speede.

Using chimpanzees for experimentation poses "huge ethical problems," said Karin Zupko, Research Director of the New England Anti-Vivisection Society (NEAVS).

"Results with [the infected chimpanzee,] Jerome, proved that HIV also caused the clinical disease in chimpanzees," said Director of the Yerkes Center Thomas R. Insel., M.D. "The results with Jerom has provided the missing piece to the puzzle."

The NEAVS said it doesn't know if the AIDS strain within the chimpanzee is the same strain developed in humans, according to Zupko. "This is a experimental artificial situation," she said, explaining that problems with the situation include prolonged isolation and confinement.

"HIV studies with chimpanzees have made a fundamental contribution to research," Insel said.

According to the NEAVS, the search for an animal "model" for AIDS has become a counterproductive end in itself. Animal studies has become a golden model for scientists since they are used to working with animal models.

Almost all of our knowledge of the pathophysiology of HIV infection has been derived from in vitro (test tube) studies, clinical trials, and autopsies, according to the NEAVS.

"One poor, sick chimpanzee does not change the fact that humans are the only practical model for this uniquely human disease," Speede said.

According to Insel, "Over 10 years ago, through chimpanzee studies conducted at several research institutes including Yerkes, we knew that HIV caused the same infection in chimpanzees that occurs in people who even tually develop clinical AIDS.

"How many thousands of chimps — an endangered species — will have to be infected in the hope of gaining a sample of sick chimps large enough to give scientific validity to any study," she asked.

Speede called the study an "absurd use of financial resources and animal lives when the opportunity for human clinical studies abounds."

Too much money is put into developing an animal model, Zupko said. For example, AZT was developed in clinical trials and not in animal experimentation.

Some of the problems surrounding an animal model include the small percentage of chimps showing AIDS-related illness, AIDS taking time to develop, chimps being an endangered species, and chimps not breeding well in captivity.

While chimpanzees in the wild are endangered, the captive population of chimpanzees in research centers are self-sustaining through births, according to Insel.

Chimps, who share 98.6 percent of human DNA, are intelligent, emotional and psychologically complex beings, according to the NEAVS. It also claims the scientific community has learned too much about chimps to ignore the degree

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts operating solely on revenue generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as the Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967 and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. Noticing race

I am a racist and, what's more, I was raised to be one.

Now before you get ready to storm the Collegian offices (again) or deluge me with hate mail or tell me to stop this "multicultural crap," please, please, please don't get me wrong. Because

When I say I am a racist, I mean that I discriminate between people on the basis of race, not that I think that white people are inherently superior to black people. Not that I get frightened when I see a black man walking towards me on the sidewalk late at night. Not that I don't support and acknowledge all that blacks have done and been for this country and this world. And certainly not that I'm against black political initiatives to get their hands on true equality in this nation. I do not call myself a racist for any of these reasons.

No, as I said, I consider myself a racist because I discriminate on the basis of race. I notice it. I think about it. I get confused about it. I see a person and there it is: race. The skin color is there. I see it. And then things happen inside my mind that I can't explain, things I am forced to label as racist.

Wendy Darling

Hypothetical situation: I'm standing on North Pleasant Street in Amherst waiting to get a bus back to the University of Massachusetts. Standing next to me is a black man. I see him. And then it begins.

If he is well-dressed, I think to myself, "God, he must have had to work for that." And I mean really work, well beyond the actual labor, but actual work against the great white current, racial politics, maybe even poverty, depending on his situation.

Or maybe he looks like an Amherst College student. "Wow," I think, "I wonder what it feels like to be at an elite school like that when there are so few people who look like you, so few role models."

Maybe the man looks like he's from UMass. "Well, then, he must think I'm such a gross little white girl," I think. Me with my transparent, snowy skin, short red hair, black trench coat. Could this guy relate to me? Or does he resent me? Does he think I'm like all the rest?

I hate myself at times like this. Why can't I just see this man and have that be it? If it was a white man, none of these processes would occur. If he was well-dressed, I'd say, "Oh, just another businessman. Big deal." Or if he was an Amherst College student: "Yup, another of those handsome scholars. For a UMass student, I probably wouldn't even register except to say: 'Another one.'"

But it's not a white man, it's a black man, and as a result, I am hit with all these stupid thoughts relating to his race. This man, through no fault of his own, has handed me a hefty load of mental baggage just by standing there: the civil rights struggle, employment discrimination, urban poverty, institutional racism, on and on and on.

And faced with this load, all I can really do is smile and try to turn my thoughts to something else. Burying my guilty conscience (forged by years living in this race-crazy society), I try to return to the island of security and homogeneity I keep hidden within myself.

That's where the way I was raised comes into the picture. Retreat to my little island and I'm slipping back to my home town, my sweet, filthy rich, crime-free, almost totally white town. Where there just aren't people like this black man to look at.

OK, OK, there are a couple of families — but only a couple. And some students at the private prep school. And the girls in the A Better Chance program, practically "imported" to bring some color to the high school. But that was all.

During all those years I spent back home, I had the chance to feel very secure about who I was and who everybody I knew was. I could say "us" and it would cover everybody in town. Going over immigration in history class, the teacher could talk about "our" ancestors: nobody there had ancestors who had been dragged to America against their will. When it came to the civil rights struggle, we could say "they."

It was easy, it was clear, it was very comfortable, all the other people at arm's length. Black people were somewhere else. Either that or they were on TV or in movies or singing on all those CDs and tapes or playing basketball. But just standing there on the street living? Not in my town.

UMass, on the other hand, has been a different story. I know that the overall number of black students is dwarfed by the masses of whites, but there are still enough to alter my attitudes about the world. I've tried to drop the "we" unless I really mean it. I try not to talk about "them" or "those people."

Instead of dealing with blacks second or third hand, I interact with them one on one, person to person, in my classes, in my work, and in my dorm. Two years ago I had a black roommate. Or at least I thought I did, until I found out she was half-Polish. But, whatever, she looked black and had to deal with what that meant in this society.

And deal with me, her (technically) racist roommate, who eventually had to just get over it and deal. Maybe not ever lose the label or get totally beyond the kind of discrimination I practice every day, but at least make up for lost time.

(P.S. To my black friends: I mean well, I swear I do. Honesty is very important to me. But still, did you really want to know?)

Leave it to Steve–er

Well, the early returns are back from New Hampshire, and guess what? Steve Forbes doesn't seem to be doing all that well. Go figure. In a race that even now has broken down into win, place or show mentality, Forbes has become an also-ran. A has-been before he even was. The problem is, he probably won't have the sense to bow out gracefully, if such a thing is possible at this point.

Forbes has run so far on one issue, a crooked smile, a bad haircut and patronizing, demeaning negative talk mostly levelled at so called "Washington insiders," and not much else. He's even refused to answer questions posed by the Associated Press that are being printed daily in newspapers all over the country. What's the matter Steve? Adhering to the old proverb about keeping your mouth shut and being thought a fool than opening it and removing all doubt?

Forbes is a twit. He's a guy who woke up one morning and decided, "Yup, I'd like to be president," probably thinking that it was the only way that he was going to lower his own share of the tax burden.

Forbes doesn't care about "you", and the problem is, he isn't even very good at faking it. His speeches declaring how good his little utopia would be for the "working people" come off with all the sincerity of a love letter from a whore. Forbes is the kind of a guy who would rather blow a kiss than make out with someone. It gives the illusion of closeness and warmth without having to actually get involved in all that messy contact.

Never mind all the math behind the flat tax; never mind how much money it would save and for whom. It doesn't really matter. I think that running an entire country requires a bit more than simply coming up with a nifty economic package. Now, if he

No one in the GOP race is particularly appealing but, to the other's credit, they've at least done at least one day's work in their lives. At least Ross Perot was a self–made millionaire twit.

Bob Dunn

were running for something like Secretary of the Treasury, now... that's a different story. But that doesn't carry nearly enough prestige with it, now does it, Steve? Nobody remembers them or builds monuments or bridges or names magazines after them if they're just the lowly treasury secretary, right, Steve? He'd still probably do a lousy job but that's more of a character flaw than a lack of expertise.

A lack of expertise is also part of the problem, though. I mean how can our results believe that someone who has been literally handed money from his father all his life actually be trusted to know how to make it for other people? No one in the GOP race is particularly appealing but, to the other's credit, they've at least done at least one day's work in their lives. At least Ross Perot was a self–made millionaire twit.

So, what do we do with the boy who would be king? Nothing. Leave Stevie alone. Let him run his race and have his fun, maybe if he does a good job, maybe he'll be allowed to have dessert before his staff turns down his bed and puts him night–night.

It's sort of a shame when you think about it, here's a guy who claims to be above all of the Washington infighting but has simply learned all the worst lessons of American politics and applied them behind this guise of "Outsider–man." When and if he starts spouting off along that line of guano again, ask yourself why would someone spend 20 million dollars in order to join a club full of people that he attacks and says he despises? Hmm.

Forbes is as bad a liar as he is a candidate and that more than anything will cost him the election. American politics has shown us that a skilled liar can ride right into history books. An inept one, like Forbes, rides right into the footnote section, where he belongs.

Opinion/Editorial

Issues of race–ing

The aircraft sat idly on the runway of Philadelphia International Airport, a place where I inevitably spend more time pre–boarding than treading air — it's a whopping 36–minute journey to Bradley International.

As I thumbed through a feature on actor Michael Douglas (you know, the guy casting agents call when they need a married middle–aged white guy to have an affair and then have viewers feel sorry for him), I couldn't help but to think how ridiculous this all was, this trip back to UMass to join my track teammates.

I hardly noticed that for the first time in the history of mankind there were interesting articles in the in–flight magazine. Usually I'm happy just to find a round–table interview with Mickey Rooney, Tom Snyder and Esther Rolle. The minor issue of a glacier being decked off the plane's wings was a slight distraction.

There I was risking fusion with a fuselage like some latter–day Buddy Holly just for the sake of my sport. Thirty–one inches of snow had fallen in the City of Brotherly Love, the airport had just re–opened hours before and suddenly I was having second thoughts about everything from boarding what essentially was tundra with annoying flight attendants and peanuts to my reason for being on the team anyway.

And then with a flip of the page I understood.

Track superstars Michael Johnson, Carl Lewis and Carl Lewis' ego were pictured in the midst of competition in all their resplendent world–class glory — but this article was not about glory. Rather the piece detailed the slow and steady decline of the sport, perhaps best exemplified by former 400–meter hurdle demigod Edwin Moses' refusal to associate himself with the governing body of U.S.A. Track and Field, the International Amateur Athletics Federation.

C. Taylor Conner

I was shocked. My hero Moses, who dominated his event from the late '70s through the late '80s, was quoted as saying he had nothing nice to say about the I.A.A.F., so he'd say nothing at all. The article went on to talk about the lack of exposure and marketing of the sport's U.S. competitors, many of whom are among the finest athletes in the world. Case in point — long–jumper Mike Powell and triple–jumper Mike Conley's dunks in the annual Foot Locker slam–dunk contest, during which their average air–time is approximately 49 minutes each (with lunch breaks included.)

As I began to imagine the death of this fine tradition, my thoughts then ran deeper and farther back in time, far beyond my years, beyond those of Moses, Lewis or Powell. The black–and–white newsreel image of Jesse Owens, a black man in pre–World War II Germany, the sprinter's sprinter of his time, an African–American holding the torch of both his nation and his Greek predecessors. Of course the most important thing is that he managed to frustrate the hell out of Hitler and his band of steroid–laden uber–athletes.

Yet with glory came a price — the indignity of Hitler's refusal to acknowledge Owens. Eerily enough, through the years the predominantly black sprint ranks who have represented the U.S. have had to endure the same treatment. In Massachusetts. And Mississippi. And Illinois. Alabama. Pennsylvania... the list goes on.

Perhaps the cruelest irony in the trend is that it seems to endorse the philosophy that black American Olympians are fine as citizens of the world, but not as citizens of their own country. This raises many a question for the modern black runner.

Why do we run for a country that still doesn't represent us? Are we still trying to run to freedom in some metaphorical sense? If so, when will we stop running? Are we really faster than white people? (Well, an Italian does have the world record in the 200–meter dash.)

All I knew was that track is what we've done, what we do and that I hoped my mom would hope get some frequent flyer miles if I became one with my charred toe Cajun–style, if you prefer) flotation device/seat.

We need you back, Edwin Moses — you've already braved the fire.

Frats Stereotyped

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the "Rush Beta Theta Beta" ad that appeared in the Jan. 30 Collegian. I am president of the Alpha Delta Phi fraternity and I took a lot of offense to the ad. The person or people responsible for this ad were out of line to associate hazing and fraternities.

My fraternity happens to be the only Greek literary society on campus. We are a group of people who have a great deal of respect for ourselves. I myself, along with the rest of my brothers would not even think of being subjected to anything demoralizing for initiation.

That is why Alpha Delta Phi resents this outlandish advertisement. I also know that the rest of the Greek Area have similar feelings. I really hope I will not have to come across this again in my reading of the Collegian.

Weinfield out of line

To the Editor:

How dare Alan Weinfield, a man whose character is synonymous with bigotry, have the audacity to dictate the contents of the Black Affairs Page.

How can Mr. Weinfield claim to know better than the Black Affairs Page editor and the African American community what exactly belongs on the Black Affairs page. As usual, another white male has taken it upon himself to tell the black community what their concerns should and should not be.

We well remember that this same Mr. Weinfield was expelled from the ALANA caucus of the SGA for his blatant racism. As president of Hillel, Mr. Weinfield worked tirelessly to block the visits of the Honorable Minister Louis Farrakhan, Professor Leonard Jefferies, Dr. Tony Martin and Rev. Al Sharpton. So, it is no surprise to us to find Mr. Weinfield, again, opposing the wishes of black students and students of color.

Where was your righteous indignation, Mr. Weinfield when the DVP sponsored the visit of the despicable author of The Bell Curve, Charles Murray? It is obvious, Alan, that you are only concerned with your own narrow agenda and self–mission.

As students of color, we will not tolerate advice from racists.

SPECIAL COLLECTIONS AND ARCHIVES, W.E.B. DU BOIS LIBRARY, UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

W.E.B. Du Bois with Chairman Mao Tse Tung, 1959.

Life and times of W.E.B. Du Bois

The name of W.E.B. Du Bois evokes respect and admiration throughout the world, especially in developing nations.

In his day, he was perhaps the most recognized American in the world, a colleague and mentor of eminent African leader Kwame Nkrumah, friend and advisor to Julius Nyerere, Mao Zedong, Chou En Lai, Sukarno, Ahmad Ben Bella, Cheddi Jagan, Jomo Kenyatta and Jawaharlal Nehru. His intellectual legacy laid the ground work for the Modern Civil Rights Movement in the United States, Pan Africanism and the Non–Aligned Movement.

Despite the emancipation proclamation and the civil war, a brutal and insidious form of racism was on the rise in the late 19th century in the United States. At that time, Du Bois, the first African American to receive a Ph.D. from Harvard and a prominent young scholar, became radicalized by a number of outrages including the Sam Hose lynching in Georgia. Sam Hose was accused of murdering his landlord's wife, and was burned at the stake by a mob. Furthermore, his body had been hacked up before the pyre was lit and his burnt remains were hawked as souvenirs. Du Bois had hoped to prevent this outrage by issuing a reasoned statement describing the facts of the case in the Atlanta Constitution.

Shymala Ivatury

Shocked and disillusioned by his lack of effectiveness, Du Bois plunged into direct action and agitation. The scholarly outcome of this radicalization was the publication of the Souls of Black Folk in 1903.

In 1906, Du Bois organized the Niagara Movement, an exclusively African American group dedicated to fighting racism. Du Bois said, "We appeal to the young men and women of this nation, to those whose nostrils are not befouled by greed and snobbery and racial narrowness. Stand up for the right, prove yourselves worthy of your heritage and whether born north or south dare to treat men as men. Cannot the nation that has absorbed 10 million foreigners into its political life without catastrophe absorb 10 million Negro Americans into the same political life at less cost than their unjust and illegal exclusion will involve?

"Courage brothers! The battle for humanity is not lost or losing. All across the skies sit signs of promise. The Slav is rising in his might, the yellow millions are tasting liberty, the black Africans are writhing towards the light and everywhere the laborer, with ballot in his hand, is voting open the gates of opportunity and peace. The morning breaks over blood–stained hills. We must not falter, we may not shrink. Above are the everlasting stars."

Though the Niagara Movement folded after three years due to powerful enemies both black and white, it laid the foundation for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Du Bois was one of the founding members of the NAACP and, in 1910, he was asked to edit its newsletter, The Crisis, as the director of publicity and research at the NAACP. Under the broad platform of civil rights, the NAACP included two competing ideological perspectives. There were those who believed that the NAACP should be primarily constituted, controlled, and financed by benevolent whites who would work to uplift African Americans. Others, such as Du Bois, believed that it should be an inter–racial organization challenging the mainstream.

As editor of The Crisis, Du Bois' caustic and militant editorials indicting the establishment for continued racism, exploitation, and lynching, and condemning U.S. support for colonial regimes and military intervention in Haiti and the Dominican Republic, elicited negative responses from the liberal leadership of the NAACP. For example, when former President Theodore Roosevelt displayed his ignorant racism by writing an essay in The Outlook that the Brazilian people regarded the "degreement of their blood as a slight weakening," Du Bois attacked his claims as "falsehoods." This attack against Roosevelt was denounced by the NAACP leadership, which claimed that the former president was a distinguished white sympathizer of colored people. In response Du Bois wrote that the African American "has nothing but friends and may the good God deliver him from them, for they are likely to lynch his soul."

Under his guidance, The Crisis became the foremost publication among African Americans, with all major political parties advertising in the journal. In the mid thirties, Du Bois was in effect ousted from the NAACP due to ideological disagreements with its liberal leadership.

Du Bois had moved beyond the traditional accomodationist line, and was now advocating "new, deliberate and purposeful segregation for economic defense," socialism and Pan Africanism. Du Bois' split with the NAACP can be seen as having presaged the recent upheaval in that organization and the ouster of Reverend Benjamin Chavis by the liberals.

Du Bois' thinking continued to evolve as he further developed a progressive and Pan Africanist consciousness. In 1951, Du Bois angered the U.S. government by circulating the Stockholm Peace Appeal stating, "we consider that the first government henceforth to use the atomic weapon against any country will be committing a crime against humanity and should be treated as a war criminal."

One day after Sen. Joseph McCarthy delivered his insane rant claiming that the State Department was replete with card carrying members of the Communist Party, Du Bois was indited by a federal grand jury for being an "unregistered agent of a foreign principal." Du Bois had been tracked by the CIA and the FBI for years. The trial lasted five days, and Du Bois was acquitted.

Du Bois continued to be hounded by the government of the United States. Nonetheless, Du Bois persisted in rallying African Americans against colonialism. At his urging in 1952, Sidney Poitier, Coleman Young, Paul Robeson and 160 others petitioned President Truman denouncing the United States government policy of supporting colonialism in Africa. They also demanded that the United States withdraw its military from all foreign territories where their presence was not authorized by all the major powers.

Du Bois wisely warned a number of Third World leaders of U.S. machinations in newly independent nations, writing to Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere, "I am a little alarmed at the American Peace Corps which I am to understand is about to come to your country. I hope you will watch those persons carefully. Most of them will be trained Nigger–baiters and filled with ideas of white supremacy."

In 1961, Du Bois achieved the culmination of his long ideological journey to the left by joining the Communist Party of the United States. When asked why he had not become a Communist earlier, Du Bois said, "I suppose one of the chief reasons that I didn't become a Communist as a young man was that nobody asked me to."

A lifelong socialist, Du Bois had exhausted the possibilities of fruitfully collaborating with liberals such as many within the leadership of the NAACP, had been hounded and harassed by the United States Government, and witnessed the resistance of the West to decolonization. In contrast he found welcome, friendship, and common cause with anti–colonial leaderships in the Third World. Mao's China went so far as to declare a national holiday honoring Dr. W.E.B. Du Bois on his birthday.

It is, perhaps, telling that this giant among Americans chose to end his days in the Third World, in Africa, far from the United States. Ghana embraced Du Bois as heartily as this country turned its back on him.

These brief glimpses of one of the most active, dynamic, and profound lives of the twentieth century give only a small insight into the courage, wisdom, radicalism, and intellectual depth of W.E.B. Du Bois. Any honors bestowed upon his memory are long overdue.

Suez

Young Egypt rose and seized her ditch
And said: "What's mine is mine!"
Old Europe sneered and cried: "The bitch
Must learn again to whine!"

The British lion up and roared
But used his nether end
Which raised a stink and made men shrink
As world peace seemed to rend.

Dull Dulles rushed about the world,
His pockets full of gold.
But sadly left his game of golf
And talked as he was told:

"Lord God! Send Peace and Plenty down,
And keep on drafting men
Send billions east and so at least
No income tax shall end."

Adlai essays with polished phrase
To say the same thing less
And prove without a shade of doubt
Both parties made this mess.

The campaign's done and Ike has won,
We spent 10 millions for the fun.
Meantime it would be well to note
How many million did not vote.

Young Israel raised a mighty cry:
"Shall Pharaoh ride anew?"
But Nasser grimly grinned West,
"They mixed this witches' brew."

Big Three are shouting long and loud,
United Nations broil;
Big Business raves: "Drop on these waves
A million tons of oil!"

With Whites withdrawn, the traffic runs
As it has run before.
But white folk fumed and pointed out
Red pilots from the shore.

Old Britain would be great again
With war on Earth, bad will to men!
But France would civilize the dead
And make the black Sahara red.

Greed splits the West and hatreds swell
To rebuild race and color pride,
Where Moses and Mohammed died
And Jesus Christ was crucified.

Israel as the West betrays
Its murdered, mocked, and damned,
Becomes the shuck troops of two knaves
Who steal the dark man's land.

Beware, white world, that great black hand
Which Nasser's power waves
Grasps hand the concentrated hate
Of myriad million slaves.

The Soviets lie blood and tears
Have made their socialism strong
The West quite frantic in its fears
Has tried to stamp it to the ground.

This cannot be, it's but the sight
Of private capital's said plight.
Fear makes America feel free
To buy revolt in Hungary.

For eastward trumpets sing the song,
The rising sun calls loud and long.
All Africa hits high its head,
And sees all Asia burning Red!

Sandler tees off in latest film

Latest "Saturday Night" flick fails to make a hole in one

HAPPY GILMORE
Directed by Dennis Dugan with Adam Sandler, Carl Weathers
Playing at Hampshire Six

If you can't get enough of the flamboyant Adam Sandler between his frequent guest appearances on "Saturday Night Live" and the release of yet another comedy CD, have no fear — Billy Madison/Opera Man/Canteen Boy is back, and this time he's called Happy Gilmore.

Happy Gilmore is silly and stupid — but it is funny. Sandler's jocular antics teeter on the edge of becoming tasteless and redundant, however they aren't terrible.

The plot is simple enough, though amply spiced-up by Sandler's character, Happy Gilmore who's grandmother neglected to pay her income tax, and now the government is repossessing her house. In order to raise the $270,000 required to buy the house back, Happy, the slacker-hockey player wannabe, abandons his stick for a golf club.

Happy could also go by the name "Lucky" as his skills at driving a golf ball are nothing short of miraculous. His only hockey skill, shooting (the guy can't skate to save his life), proves useful as his long-range driving lands him on the pro-golf circuit.

Carl Weathers plays an ex-pro-golfer whose takes Happy under his wing, and gets him started on the links. Weathers' big comic contribution to the film is his awkward wooden hand which Happy manages to splinter away each time he meets him.

Happy's arch nemesis on the golf course, played by an overly-conceited Christopher McDonald, does everything in his power to prevent Happy from winning the championship tournament.

Happy's fans support him though, as he brings a new following to golf, which include beer funneling and tailgating. Gone are the pastel polo shirts and plaid pants — Happy proudly dons his Bruins jersey as he tees off.

A particularly twisted and hilarious scene takes place between the rambunctious Happy and his celebrity golf partner, Bob Barker. Barker displays his fortitude as he puts Happy in his place.

There is sort of a moral to this story, and Happy does grow (as much as an immature screw-up can). There is nothing particularly special about Happy Gilmore — but it is more hilarious than obnoxious. It's a big, goofy screenfull of Adam Sandler, who leaves us wishing that actual golf tournaments could be as entertaining. B–

Merchant to take Mullins stage

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Natalie Merchant will give you something to remember when she takes the Mullins Center stage tonight. Touring in support of her first solo effort, Tigerlily, Merchant has proven she has what it takes to make it on her own.

Merchant was discovered by the members of 10,000 Maniacs at age 17. She was a quiet girl who kept meticulous journals and sketch books according to the liner notes of the band's first album, Hope Chest.

Despite her success with the Maniacs, Merchant felt that she needed to do her own thing and left the band in July of 1993 to pursue a solo career ending over a decade of success with the band. Snapped up by Electra, Tigerlily debuted at No. 13 on the Billboard pop chart and her single "Carnival" would haunt the top 10 for weeks. Included on the album was a tribute to actor River Phoenix and 10 other tracks that the artist had inside her for awhile.

In an interview with Entertainment Magazine, Merchant talked about leaving the band five weeks into production of Our Time In Eden which produced hits like "Candy Everybody Wants" and "These Are Days."

"We spent too long working on the record," Merchant said. "I just came to rehearsal one day and said, 'It's over. I really can't do this anymore.' And I remember [bassist] Steve Gustafson saying, 'I'm actually surprised you stayed as long as you did.'"

According to the article the 10,000 Maniacs are still touring minus their star singer (they played Pearl Street last semester) and refuse to comment on the break-up or Merchant.

Nicki MacHugh, sales representative for the Mullins Center said that tickets are still available for the show and should be purchased at the box office. No purchases may be made over the phone.

"The stage is set up for a more intimate setting so whatever seats you get they'll be good," said MacHugh.

Tonight's concert will begin at 8 p.m. For tickets and info, call the Mullins Center Box Office at 545-1515.

D'Rivera surprises at Iron Horse Hall

By Matt Wexler

CARIBBEAN JAZZ PROJECT
Iron Horse
Feb. 19

The Caribbean Jazz Project, led by vibraphone player Dave Samuels, saxophonist Paquito D'Rivera and steel drum player Andy Narrell leapt into their first tune, "Paco & Dave" with an intensity I wasn't expecting. The band reacted well to one another, which is essential to jazz music. The drummer, Mark Walker, was especially supportive, backing up each soloist with appropriate fills and rhythms to add that extra edge to everybody's playing.

The band toyed with the audience's collective ear throughout the night, occasionally switching from their signature Latin and Samba moods into a swing jazz style. One especially amusing surprise was a Latin arrangement of late trumpet master Dizzy Gillespie's "A Night in Tunisia" which the band varied with different rhythms, pulses and moods.

The solos were superior across the board, with each band member getting a chance to strut his stuff. D'Rivera, possibly the most experienced and well known of the group, excelled on the alto saxophone and clarinet, playing the full range of each instrument in both enchanting and frantic solos. Samuels' vibe playing was extravagant and filled with emotion as always, while Andy Narrell's steel drum prowess was worth showing up to witness by itself.

But the rest of the band went the distance as well, as Walker had his chances to shine on drums, Dario Eskenazo let his fingers dance along the piano and Oscar Stagnaro demonstrated his electric bass competence dramatically on a tune titled "Venezuela Suite," which began with a clarinet solo by D'Rivera but segued into an incredible bass interlude in which Stagnaro played not only the melody line and bass line, but his own accompaniment.

However, it was the solos that made this performance enjoyable. During the beginnings of most of the songs, the band seemed very uneasy, almost overly tense, until the tune got underway. Then the band would open up and let loose, providing an intensity coupled with a musical prowess that was astounding.

The Caribbean Jazz Project proved themselves to be a festive and enjoyable group of musicians, despite the formidable task of trying to make themselves sound new and different from what bands like them have done in the past.

French professor protests cuts

By Susan Ely
Collegian Correspondent

Professor of French and Italian Donald Maddox lectured at the Sorbonne in Paris last month on Medieval French poetry, specifically 12th century poet, Marie de France and her work, "Lais."

Maddox was invited by faculty members to speak at the premier French University. Maddox has spoken often at the Sorbonne in his frequent travels to France. He lectured on "Lais" because de France's work is a main topic on the "Aggregation," a final exam required for graduation at the Sorbonne.

"You might think we're lecturing to them on their own turf," Maddox said.

However, many American scholars conduct research on French literature and contribute to research projects with French colleagues. Recently, Maddox was part of a doctoral committee at the Sorbonne, and in advising French graduate students.

Maddox said he enjoys speaking to French students at the Sorbonne. He was knowledgeable about its foundation in 1215, but worried that "despite its prestige, it has not escaped recent financial crises." His concern is that many facilities are in disrepair and inadequate and need much restoration.

Maddox said he is also concerned with the recent threat of the elimination of the French Ph.D. program at UMass, as well the Judaic Studies and Slavics programs. Maddox said he believed the provost's proposals would be "cutting deeply into the sinews of the humanities on this campus."

Maddox said the reasons for the proposed cuts were due to retirements in the department. UMass has the only nationally ranked French Ph.D. program in the Northeast, thus making the elimination a serious loss, said Maddox.

In the past six years the French department has "earned international recognition as one of the most active centers of French and Medieval Studies in North America," Maddox said.

UMass has brought guest speakers from around the world, held large international Medieval Congresses, and four international seminars on French Middle Age culture. Maddox helped to organize many of these events.

Jones continues plans for elections

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Martin Jones announced his plans to continue his attempts to convince Massachusetts Governor William Weld to run for President in the current election, but he took a more resigned tone to the probability of his cause.

Jones, the chairman of the Bill Weld for President National Draft Committee held a press conference at the Bangs Community Center yesterday to announce the continued plans of his organization.

"We don't have many supporters, because Bill Weld for President is not very realistic," he said.

Weld has said on several occasions that he is not interested in being a candidate this year. Jones hopes that what he considered an imminent victory for Pat Buchanan in yesterday's New Hampshire primary would convince Weld to change his mind.

"It is very important that Weld enters the race to offer a stronger campaign against Buchanan than Dole or Alexander," Jones said. "I think tomorrow will be a different response with Buchanan becoming the front runner."

Jones mailed a formal appeal to Weld yesterday to reconsider his position, but stated that this would be his last attempt. He added that if Weld failed to enter the game as a write in candidate before Feb. 27 that he would end his quest.

"I have plans to formally adjourn this committee at the end of the month," he said.

Jones, who was tackled on the William D. Mullins Center basketball court at Thursday's game while running across the court with a sign that said "Pat Buchanan doesn't care about us," also used the press conference to announce that he is filing a lawsuit against the University of Massachusetts, and Thorr Bjorn, the associate athletic director in charge of ticket sales.

Jones claimed that the tackle by Bjorn, was excessive. Jones also blasted men's basketball coach John Calipari for praising Bjorn's actions.

"I would have been easily escorted off the floor," he said. "I had already made my point."

Jones released a list of demands for both Calipari and Bjorn.

"I am issuing an ultimatum, an unconditional list of three demands for Bjorn and Coach Calipari," he said.

He asked that Calipari publicly apologize for praising Bjorn and that Bjorn issue a written apology.

His second demand was that Calipari ask that the cartoon depicting students bowing down to Calipari not run on the Mullins Center screen.

Finally Jones demanded that Calipari donate 10 percent of his 1995 salary to the Martin Luther King Jr. Community Center in Springfield.

"It's a moral obligation for him," Jones said.

"There is no evidence that Jerome was in pain before his death," Insel said.

Jerome received extensive care from Yerkes veterinarians and by the center's behavioral scientist who is in charge of the laboratory animal's environment, according to Insel.

"When you put animals in the lab, their immune system suffers" from the stress of isolation and results are affected by the physiological affects of confinement, Zupko said.

Insel said, "Studying and caring for the first animal with AIDS has been challenging. We have treated opportunistic infections aggressively, but ultimately we were left fighting a relentless disease for which there is no cure."

Money has been diverted from beneficial measures including HIV testing and counseling services, prevention and education, care giving of those afflicted with the disease, and carefully planning clinical research with patients, according to Zupko.

"People with AIDS don't have time for this type of folly," Speede said.

"We would like to expand to cover all of these classes that people say would be great... as long as it pays for itself, we'll cover anything," said Lebow, a former education, English and STPEC major.

Olson and Lebow explained the business has been a learning experience for professors, too. They estimated that about 85 percent of the professors who had previously said "no" to the service said "yes" this semester.

"We have professors that are so excited to have their notes reflected back at them," said Lebow. "It gives them the opportunity to figure out if this is what they are trying to say to their students."

Former notetaker Erik Brischler, a forestry major, explained there are many benefits to the job.

"I not only got to help out the rest of my students by providing them with the notes, but I also benefitted a lot because of the fact I had to take all of my notes twice, and I learned that much better," he said.

Successful notetakers are motivated students who can pick up the main points and approach professors with any questions.

"Only the notetaker can really know what is going to be the most helpful thing for the student... if you take really good notes and can communicate with your professor, you'll increase your chance of selling packets," Olson said.

Mad Dasher will be accepting applications throughout the semester and students in all classes are encouraged to apply.

Notetakers are guaranteed payment after selling five packets. Rates generally run $15 per week, plus 50 cents for each packet sold, with opportunities for advancement. If a student is not satisfied with the notes, he has the opportunity to challenge the notetaker and submit his material for hire.

Mad–Dasher Notes is open Mon.–Thurs. 10 p.m. – 6 p.m., Fri. 10 p.m. – 2 p.m., and Sun. 3 p.m. – 8 p.m. and is located in the Newman Center basement.

Col. Mustard trio to play Pearl St.

By Jed Curtis
Collegian Correspondent

"If the tour busses of James Brown and Phish crashed, after sorting through all the bodies you'd have the Colonel Mustard Trio," claimed singer/guitarist Andy Gerard.

The band plays "music so fat you'll have to wear your dad's pants," bassist Ryan Harris said.

The charisma and magnetism of the Colonel Mustard Trio reminds one of the Trinity. This is not to imply religious affiliation, but rather to convey the unbridled power of their music. To extend this comparison, drummer Jason Wizelman is the Father due to his status as group elder; Gerard is the Son due to his ichnographic resemblance to Jesus; and Harris is the Holy Ghost by default. The frenzied, ecstatic dancing of their audiences brings to mind the Greek god Dionysus.

While in concert the musicians adopt "funk" style stage names. Wizelman is called Cool Papa; Gerard is known as Hollis Weebalo Sister; and Harris answers to Freddy Sanford James.

In an attempt to categorize the band, Gerard stated, "We're an environmental band. We don't throw our guitars in the ocean or beat up baby seals with them or put whales in our tunafish... We're nice."

The Colonel Mustard Trio was formed in November 1994, and has played at Mike's Billiards, Fire and Water, UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition's Extravaganja concert and a headline spot at MansPing's Earthday show.

The Colonel Mustard trio will play Pearl Street this Thurs. at 8:30 p.m.

Film takes sly look at late night battle

HBO shows viewers what it's like with Letterman & Leno

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Producer Ivan Reitman finds out this weekend how viewers take to his sly, satirical HBO movie detailing the guerrilla warfare over Johnny Carson's "Tonight Show" throne.

But he's already heard from one key figure: Mikey likes it. That's Michael Ovitz, president of Walt Disney Co., who in his previous life as Hollywood agent-czar helped engineer the deal that brought David Letterman to CBS and nearly pulled "Tonight" out from under Jay Leno.

Ovitz (in a deliciously silken turn by actor Treat Williams) is among the behind-the-scenes powerbrokers depicted in HBO's The Late Shift, which debuts at 8 p.m. Saturday.

With the proper measure of noblesse oblige, Ovitz didn't keep Reitman on edge.

"The only one who called me up and has spoken about his own portrayal has been Michael Ovitz, who really liked it," Reitman reports.

That's one land mine avoided. But how about Bob Wright, chairman and CEO of NBC? How does he think he comes across? What about the late-night stars themselves, Leno and Letterman? Are they amused or spitting nails?

Why, in fact, take on a project riddled with big names and big egos and all the potential angst that implies for a filmmaker?

"I've actually asked myself that question through the process," said Reitman, who as a successful director and producer (Ghostbusters and Dave are among his credits) wields a bit of power himself.

"I certainly was not doing it for the money... I hadn't really done anything for TV except for early series work," he said. So why? "I liked the book. It was one of those things."

The book is The Late Shift by New York Times television reporter Bill Carter, who chronicled the frantic efforts by, and on behalf of, Leno and Letterman to gain "Tonight" upon Carson's 1992 retirement.

Carter's work grabbed Reitman, and not because it was about show business.

"I've always shied away from backstage stories. I hate movies about that, in general. They have a tendency to be inside," he said. "But this one was so accurately written it wasn't a parody of anything."

"I thought the book told a very emotional story of two men who are friends, with great dreams, similar dreams, who ironically then have to confront each other, deal with each other, compete with each for the prize."

Dreaming aside, the movie, co-written by Carter and George Armitage and directed by Betty Thomas, goes for the funny bone and hits it.

All that is imagined as the worst of Hollywood — the greed, the posturing, the ambition — is laid out for our viewing pleasure. And we get to watch just how smoothly the sharks swim.

Williams' delightfully suave depiction of Ovitz is a case in point. In one bravura scene, Ovitz creates a vision of glory for Letterman — if he allows Ovitz and his Creative Artists Agency to act as fairy godmother.

"If you give us the privilege of working with you, CAA will take care of everything your talents deserve and your spirit desires," Ovitz tells Letterman (John Michael Higgins).

"Jesus, it was like having a meeting with the godfather," a giddy, awestruck Letterman says afterward.

Both Leno and Letterman are shown as honorable competitors, although a bit wimpy. Carson (courtesy of impressionist Rich Little) remains the gold standard, a figure of sure-footed grace.

The villains, such as they are, are network executives whose loyalty is to the (fill-in-the-blank) winner and, most spectacularly, Leno's voracious manager Helen Kushnick.

In Kathy Bates' remarkable tour-de-force performance, Kushnick is depicted as a foul-mouthed, devious and spiteful woman — who is clever enough to get Leno (Daniel Roebuck, with a fake jaw that kinda works) exactly what he wants.

"Helen, you're as subtle as a knee to the groin," then-NBC programming head Brandon Tartikoff tells Kushnick at one point.

Which is, it appears, what it takes to succeed in Tinsel Town.

"You want to know the real difference between you and Letterman? You had me," Kushnick tells Leno after he wins "Tonight."

As The Late Shift reminds us, there's no business like show business.

"EVERY DAY, A NEW COLLEGIAN TO READ. LIFE JUST CAN'T GET BETTER THAN THIS DAVE."

"IT SURE CAN'T MARC, IT'S EXCITEMENT IN ITS PUREST FORM."

"[Assistant coach] Mark Dennehy said that if everybody wants to put their heads down between their knees we're going to lose, but if everybody wants to pick their heads up, we're still in this game."

"I wanted us to wake up or the game would be over before we had a chance [to come back]," Regan recalled of his thoughts at the time. "We came into the second period with a lead and we let it slip away. Tonight proves just how tough it is to win games in this league."

The Minutemen entered the third revitalized scoring just 1:55 into the frame on a power play goal by Rob Bonneau.

One of the least likely sources of a goal came through for the Minutemen to knot the game at five with 10:25 to play in regulation. Fourth line center Judd Smith, playing for only the second time in the last six games, won the face off back to Tom O'Connor at the point. O'Connor, who's only other goal this season came in the season opener at Army back in October, dangled, spun around a UNH forward, and fired a 45 foot blast past Cavicchi.

John Jacques put UMass back on top at the 11:11 mark, stealing the puck while shorthanded, and deftly breaking between Mark Mowers and Nickulas. Jacques put home the rebound of his own shot and the Minutemen were up 6-5.

UNH pulled Cavicchi with 30 seconds to play for the extra attacker, and converted off of a face off with just 2.7 seconds remaining. Tim Murray slid a pass across the crease to Nickulas, who put it past Regan just before a circling Jacques could take him out of the play.

"He was my guy," Jacques admitted afterwards. "I got spun around with my back to the puck. There's no excuses. I have to get that guy's stick up. I feel pretty awful about it. I'm a senior and there's no excuse."

Despite having a power play apiece the teams skated to a scoreless overtime session, and advanced to a shootout. Nickulas notched UNH's only goal on the team's first shot as Regan dominated from there. Perry scored on a 20 foot wrist shot to tie the shootout, and Campanale sealed the extra point with a smooth fake to his forehand.

things will take care of themselves."

The Minutewomen have worked hard since the season opened earlier this winter, and Dold feels that his group of talented athletes should wrap up their season on an upswing.

"These are an amazing group of not only athletes, but people," said Dold. "They have stuck together and helped each other, and become, in essence a team. Their fantastic people and they're going to swim great... we're going to have a great meet."

the NHL, a relief to me and all my colleagues in this business.

Lastly, we find two laughable juxtapositions. Hockey Stars regrets Detroit's all-Russian five man unit that often takes the ice together, because their names are difficult to pronounce, then it immediately denounces Euro-bashing. What do you call that? It's not so hard to say Fedorov, anyway.

Right below the minus given to "phantom assists" is a graph labeled "the end of an era." What era? That was spanned by Wayne Gretzky, the King (and Oiler) of phantom assists.

While there's a wealth of good points in Hockey Stars #46, the contradictions herein are quite startling and a little embarrassing. How about a little extra proof reading the next time, guys. And the centerfold of Kevin Stevens in a Bruins uniform hurts, too.

• If you compare Bill Ranford's numbers in Edmonton this year to those in his brief Boston tenure, they're pretty similar. That's not a knock on Ranford, it's another one for the Bruins, who really aren't a much better defensive team than the Oilers, and that's scary.

• Two goalies who are keeping the biscuit out of the basket surprisingly well and in very different scenarios are Chicago's Jeff Hackett and Ottawa's Damian Rhodes. Hackett is a deserving finalist for the Vezina Trophy, as he leads the NHL in goals-against average and is among the save-percentage leaders. All this from a guy whose last starring role was with the old Springfield Indians of the AHL, whom he guided to a Calder Cup in 1991.

Rhodes is one of the good things about the Senators, who were subjected to a long tirade in the Hockey Stars bad section. Well, they are bad, but they aren't on the road to ruin any longer, particularly since Rhodes has shown he can handle the No. 1 role. Despite a losing record, he is stopping more than 90-percent of the shots he's seen to go with a GAA below 3.00. You can't ask for more than that.

• Ottawa should approach respectability in 1996-97. Really. Though this has been another joke of a season for the Senators, their fourth in as many years, they found themselves a fine right wing in All-Star Daniel Alfredsson, they'll have Alexei Yashin for a full season, and Wade Redden should be redd-y. The second overall pick in the 1995 draft, he was acquired from the Islanders in part for the first pick in '95 (by Ottawa), Bryan Berard, who wanted no part of the Senators system.

I saw both defensemen in the World Junior Championships last month, and while Berard showed more offensively, Redden is no stranger to the rush and he is super solid in his own zone, where Ottawa has been so atrocious throughout its NHL existence. You'll also notice Redden has expressed no qualms toward playing in the Palladium, because he's a great kid, another NHL nice guy in the making. We'll hear from you soon, Wade.

Red Sox among top three in AL East

BRIAN PERILLO on Baseball

It's that time of year again. If you are wondering how much longer until spring, don't bother asking if the groundhog saw his shadow. Simply look south, and you'll notice a sure sign that the winter snows will soon be receding.

Pitchers and catchers will report to spring training this week.

Major League Baseball will begin what they hope will be (cross your fingers) their first full season in three years. Forget the fact that there's no labor agreement; optimism and spring training go hand in hand. At this point in the season, every team believes that they have a shot at making the World Series.

• In the National League, no team reloaded more than the St. Louis Cardinals. The Redbirds, now led by new skipper Tony LaRussa, suffered only one real loss, that of outfielder Bernard Gilkey who bolted to the Mets. However, the Cards added slugger Ron Gant, and revamped the left side of their infield by acquiring 3B Gary Gaetti, and SS Royce Clayton.

The rotation, even if left-hander Danny Jackson isn't ready by opening day, is solid. Also watch for the emergence of Alan Benes, a rookie who will join his older brother Andy on the St. Louis staff. New closer Dennis Eckersley solidifies their bullpen.

The Cards' off season spending spree and Gant's defection from Cincinatti has turned the tables in the NL Central. The Reds, last year's champs, have added a lot of names, but not much quality. The Reds rotation will miss David Wells, and Cincy may end up watching Houston and the Cardinals fly away with the division.

• In the junior circuit, the Orioles have stacked their lineup with new acquisitions, but the AL East could be the most competitive division in the American League. The O's, Yankees and Red Sox will all battle for the top spot, with the runner up likely snagging the league's wild card berth.

All three rotations will look for their pitchers to rebound. The Yanks hope Jimmy Key and Melido Perez can return from injury, and the Sox will look for Aaron Sele to do the same.

The Beantowners also hope that the Tim Wakefield who carried them through much of last year's early season will show up on the hill in '96, and not the other Wakefield, whose knuckleball got creamed during the second half.

The Orioles rotation can count on Mike Mussina and newly acquired lefties Wells and Kent Mercker, but the big question is whether Scott Erickson can return to the form that helped him win 20 with the Twins a few years back.

The Yanks, Sox and O's all have potent bats and will put up a lot of runs. Which is the best? To answer that question, you have to go position by position around the diamond...

First base: Three true sluggers man this spot for the teams in question, but Boston's Mo Vaughn has to get the nod. The league's MVP, Vaughn is only slightly better than the Oriole's Rafael Palmeiro, who finished with 39 homers. Tino Martinez takes over for Don Mattingly in the Bronx, and while he has a lot of power, the former Mariner is not in the same league as Vaughn and Palmeiro. Edge: Sox

Second base: The Orioles solidified this position by signing one of the best defensive second basemen ever to play the game, Roberto Alomar. And he can hit, too. Alomar is an All-Star, and easily out-ranks whoever the other two teams put at the position, whether it be the Yanks' Mariano Duncan or Pat Kelly, or the Sox' Will Cordero or Luis Alicea. Edge: O's

Shortstop: Allright, before the Orioles' fans start shouting about the heroics of Cal Ripken, Jr., let me just say, "Wait a second." The Bosox' John Valentin had numbers that far surpassed the Iron Man's, and while Ripken's consecutive games played streak is monumental, he doesn't have the offense to match Valentin. The Yanks fall far short here as well, counting on rookie Derek Jeter or struggling Tony Fernandez. Edge: Sox

Third base: This position, more than any other, is where all three teams could make an argument for their player. The O's B.J. Surhoff, Sox' Tim Naehring, and Yanks' Wade Boggs all hit over .300 with around 10 homers. It's close, but add in defense and leadership, and Boggs gets the nod. Edge: Yanks

Catcher: The Yanks will miss Mike Stanley, the new Sox' receiver, who has the best bat of the bunch here. Oriole Chris Hoiles can hit as well, and new Yankee receiver Joe Girardi receives a lot of credit for his defense (though Stanley actually had less errors last year). Edge: Sox

Leftfield: The Sox' Mike Greenwell heads the list here. New to the Bronx, Tim Raines is overrated, and won't put up the consistent numbers that Greenwell will, though Gator's defense is suspect. The Orioles group of players is headed by the returned Mike Devereaux. Edge: Sox

Centerfield: There are no real marquis players here, but Yankee Bernie Williams is one step away. The O's Brady Anderson is almost as good, while the Sox lag well behind the pack with speedy but light hitting Alex Cole or unproven youngster Dwayne Hosey (although Hosey was a 30-30 man in Triple A). Edge: Yanks

Right field: There is a big edge for the Yankees here, as Paul O'Neill has established himself as one of the premier right fielders in the league. Oriole Jeffrey Hammonds has a lot of talent, but needs to show he can produce at the Major League level. If the Sox keep Jose Canseco at DH, that leaves Troy O'Leary as the every day right fielder. Edge: Yanks

Designated Hitter: The Sox and Orioles have proven hitters filling this slot in Canseco and Bobby Bonilla. Both hit .300 with close to 30 homers last year, but if Canseco plays rightfield, the Sox will have to fill the DH slot with Reggie Jefferson, which could be ugly. The Yankees hope Ruben Sierra can rediscover his swing. Edge: O's

There you have it. Position by position, the Sox get the edge at four spots, the Yanks at three, and the O's at two. Guess there's only one way to find out who the best team is the East is...

Let them play the games.

No way Jose on time for spring camp

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — No Jose? No problem.

Jose Canseco was missing from the Boston Red Sox first full-squad workout yesterday morning, and general manager Dan Duquette was miffed.

"Jose has a flair for a dramatic entrance so when he does show, I'm sure it will be very dramatic," Duquette said as he stood in foul territory with players practicing behind him.

As the day wore on, the mystery deepened.

Where was Jose? He lives just two hours away on Florida's east coast and hadn't called to say he'd be late. He had signed a two-year, $9 million contract in the offseason, so that wasn't a problem.

The drama reached its climax at 1:10 p.m.

As manager Kevin Kennedy told a crowd of reporters he wasn't upset with the no-show, Canseco strode into the clubhouse. The manager's office quickly emptied and Jose became a Pied Piper, cameras and writers trailing him.

"I don't know what's so dramatic about this," Canseco said. The Red Sox reporting date for pitchers and catchers was Monday. The rest of the team was due Tuesday. Infielder Wil Cordero didn't show up either, but he had a snag at an airport in Puerto Rico and left a message for Duquette.

"These guys need to make a commitment to the team and the time to do that is when you start spring training," Duquette said. "They owe it to the rest of the team to show up on time." The standard player agreement, however, has a deadline of next Tuesday so a fine seemed unlikely. Canseco preferred that interpretation.

"I've never come in early before, so [Duquette] should be extremely ecstatic," he said.

"It all depends on your perspective," Duquette said with a smile.

Duquette seemed to be the only person upset that Canseco missed the first workout of a spring training in which he's expected to prepare for a return to right field after being a designated hitter the last two years.

"The club is disappointed," Duquette said. "I know a lot of the players are disappointed."

"My teammates will not say that," Canseco said. "They're grown men."

He was right.

"This team is not really concerned about little things," Mo Vaughn said. "I don't think anybody's upset with him. We're happy that he made it here today. We knew he wasn't going to come here by 9."

"I don't care," Roger Clemens said. "As long as he's ready to play and hit some bombs, we're glad to have him."

Teammates wasted no time getting on Canseco as he walked from one end of the clubhouse to his locker on the other end.

"Hey, Elvis," third baseman Tim Naehring said as he shook the charismatic Canseco's hand.

"Hey, Diesel, what have you been doing? Would you wake up?" Vaughn said, as Canseco sat down next to him.

"Tomorrow," Canseco said.

He said he had intended to show up for Tuesday's 8:30 a.m. team meeting but was delayed by a charity golf tournament in West Palm Beach on Monday. That's about a 2 1/2-hour drive from Fort Myers. Canseco said he arrived here at about 4 a.m. and by then it was too late to call anyone.

"I had a long drive. I had a lot of things to take care of," he said. "I was sick with allergies. I just could not get up this morning."

Asked if he had appeared at the tournament on behalf of the Red Sox, Canseco said, "that sounds good. I like that one."

He said he was in good shape and his arm felt fine. If he stays injury-free, he feels he has a shot at 40 homers and 40 stolen bases for the second time in his career.

The Red Sox had the second worst fielding percentage in baseball last season and, Canseco joked, "we might be the worst" with him in the outfield.

Eventually, the discussion returned to his arrival after the Red Sox wanted him to report but before the standard agreement said he had to.

"I'm here six days early," Canseco said with a laugh. "That's the first time. They should throw a party for that one."

Duquette, though, wasn't in a party mood.

Women's gymnastics ranked No. 16 in new poll

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

As if facing the third and the fifth nationally ranked teams in the country wasn't enough, the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team continued their mammoth schedule by going up against the No. 1 team in the nation on Friday.

Despite this tough schedule, it was a strong performance that UMass threw at Alabama, as the Minutewomen, now No. 16 in the country, fell 196.675 to 191.400 in front of 7,000-plus fans.

Out of 24 routines, UMass made only one mistake, committing one foul in the last event, the balance beam. Despite the loss, coach Dave Kuzara was pleased with his squad's outing, realizing the strength of the Crimson Tide and the level of his team at this point in time.

"I'm real happy with our performance," Kuzara said. "It's always tough to go after No. 1, and to have only one mistake is a good meet. We understand that Alabama's skill level is probably higher than ours. Our key has got to be our consistency."

UMass, who fell to 2-4, was led by freshman Anita Sanyal, who scored a season-high 9.800 on beam, good for fourth in the event. Also, freshman Denise Johnson and junior Lianne Laing tied for fourth on vault with scores of 9.775.

Junior Tara Swartz, who holds the team's highest all- around and beam score, was the Minutewomen's top all- around finisher against the Crimson Tide (6-1), scoring 38.425 to place fourth overall. Swartz also finished fifth on the uneven bars with a 9.825.

"We're a talented enough team where we don't have to rely on one person to carry the load," Kuzara said. "But we're also not good enough where we can make mistakes and expect to have a great meet."

After being on the road for four meets, Kuzara and his team are more than happy to be able to return home for three consecutive meets, starting Monday against Eastern Michigan. Everything from the crowd support to knowing the feel of one's own equipment can have a positive effect on the gymnasts.

"We're thrilled to be home, without a doubt," Kuzara said. "After seeing No. 1, No. 3 and No. 5 on the road, it will be refreshing to finally return. And I'm really hoping for a good crowd at the Cage. We'd love for as many fans as possible to come down and be as obnoxious as they want for UMass. The meet itself is only an hour and a half long, and it's scheduled on a night where there is no other sporting events on campus.

"Right now this is the best this team has ever been. We've never been ranked this high. And I feel that these past challenging meets will help us in the championship meets later this season."

Currently, UMass is ranked second in the region behind Penn St. To overtake the Nittany Lions, UMass will need to do well at home. And in the long-run, success now will pay off by receiving a high seed in the regionals later this season.

Perhaps the following facts give an idea of the program's recent progress. Last season, the season-high point total for the Minutewomen was 190.9. In three out of their first four meets this year, they have already topped it. Also, just two years ago, the team was ranked 20 spots lower than it is now.

"And we're not done," Kuzara said. "We think we're a little better than 16."

Massachusetts swimming gears up for tournament

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

The time has come. The meet that is the highlight of the women's swimming and diving season, the Atlantic 10 Championships, will take place this weekend at the Flickinger Aquatic Center in Buffalo, N.Y.

Over 380 swimmers and divers are expected to compete in this three day meet which will begin on tomorrow and continue through Saturday, alternating events for both the men and women. Last year the Minutewomen finished fifth at the Atlantic 10's, but this year the women have a great chance at improving on last year's performance.

UMass compiled a 6-2 dual meet record this season with a second place finish at the New England Championships. Their ultimate goal for this year's A-10 meet is least a third place finish, and the swimmers are optimistic.

"I think it's going to be to be a good matchup for the top three spots between St. Bonaventure, LaSalle, and us," said senior Jessica Griffith. "I really think we have the potential to win the whole thing. Hopefully we've got a lot of people seeded really well and everybody will just come through."

The Minutewomen have increased their ambitions as the season progressed.

"At the beginning of the year we thought our goal would be for the top three, and we've kind of changed that to second, so it looks really good and everyone's really pumped up," said senior Kristin Chapelle.

UMass senior Sarah Baker holds the fastest time this year in Atlantic 10 competition in the 50 yard free-style with 24.36, with Griffith in fourth with a time of 25.11.

Kerrin McCarthy was ranked with the best times of the year in the 100 and 200 yard backstroke events, as Barbara Hickey and Karen Sonnwald who have performed well will lead the attack in the distance events.

Diving has also been strong this season and diving coach Guy Pollino has high hopes for his divers.

There are five divers that are taken from each zone that will go to the Div. 1 Nationals, and Angelique Rodriguez will be in the running for that spot. Rodriguez finished atop the charts in first place in the A-10 overall in the three meter diving events and second in the one meter contests.

"She has a real legitimate shot of winning if not placing in the top two or three at A-10's," said Pollino.

St. Bonaventure is the favorite to take home it's first women's title. Sophomore Tricia Cuti was the 1995 Atlantic 10 Newcomer of the year and is the defending champion in the 100 and 200 yard butterfly.

Freshman Lisa Balzer is the A-10 leader in the 100 and 200 yard breaststroke and the school record holder in the latter event while freshman Anna Beliveau is tops in the 100 yard free-style. Junior Sara Doncet heads the Bonnies' backstroke efforts and is a member of the defending champion 200 yard medley relay team.

The opposition includes George Washington's Bambi Bowman, the defending champion and record holder in the 200, 500, and 1650 yard free-style and a 1995 All-American in the 500 yard free-style. Teammate Connie Shelton won the 200 yard breaststroke last year. At the top for LaSalle are free-style specialist Dina Dormer and backstroke specialist Trisha Swanson as it's top performers. Rounding out the field, Virginia Tech has Jennifer Finotti, the league leader in the 200 yard individual medley.

"We've been preparing for this all semester long," said assistant coach Joelle Dold. "They've definitely trained enough this season, and been though enough this season, and their strong enough to handle anything."

"We've trained all year for this one meet," said sophomore Jodi Walters. "Everyone's definitely ready, and have worked real hard."

St. Bonaventure coach Michael Litzinger sees a wide open meet.

"It will be a highly competitive meet and we are happy to be hosting it," said Litzinger. "We're just looking to swim fast. If we can do that, the other specialty had been scoring goals in season openers, as his only two previous goals came in the first games of the 1994 and 1995 campaigns, decided to make an exception. His first "rest of the season goal" was a pretty one.

After junior center Judd Smith drew the puck back to him at the point, O'Connor did a 360 degree turn to avoid an attacking forward and unloaded a slapshot past Cavicchi to essentially start the game over again at 5-5.

Senior Jon Jacques took advantage of UNH's slide with a shorthanded goal less than two minutes later to give UMass its first lead since early in the second.

The ride appeared to be ending, as UMass looked to have sealed its first win against the Wildcats, but Eric Nickulas had other ideas forcing the game into overtime with a goal with

The game's one constant?

UMass goaltender Brian Regan. While six goals against doesn't jump off the stat sheet as impressive numbers for a goalie, just ask UNH coach Dick Umile what he thought of Regan's performance.

"Tremendous," Umile said. "He played a great game for them. He made some tremendous saves."

His play was magnified once again in the shootout as only one UNH breakaway (Nickulas) was successful.

"I enjoy it," said Regan of the shootout. "That's why you want to become a goaltender... to have the one-on-one challenge. I'd rather win, but I enjoy the shootouts."

Umile doesn't share Regan's enthusiasm.

"I hate it," he said following the game. "I've never liked it. You go into a shootout after a great hockey game and you end up feeling like you lost, when in fact you didn't lose. I think it stinks. All the coaches in the league know how I feel."

The next ride starts this Saturday at 8 p.m..

Women's hoop tries for six in a row

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball squad is in the midst of a virtual 180 in the win-loss column as of late, and it couldn't have come at a better time.

The Minutewomen are in Ohio where they will face the Dayton Flyers, 8-15, 3-10 in the Atlantic 10. Throughout the first half of the season, UMass (17-7, 9-4) was caught in a rut, winning two games, losing the next, winning two more, dropping the next in what seemed like a vicious cycle.

Then, in early February, the Minutewomen faced Fordham in the first of a four game home-stand dropping the lackluster Rams 72-50. They haven't lost since. After the shellacking of Fordham, UMass went on to wrap up its stint in the William D. Mullins Center with four wins across the board.

Most recently, the Minutewomen returned to Fordham beating them by an even larger margin, 62-34 to kick off a three game road-trip. Dayton is the next stop on the road, as Massachusetts looks to extend its winning streak to six.

Dayton, which currently sits in the doghouse of the A-10 West shouldn't put up much of a fight for this hot UMass team.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen, as she has season-long, is senior co-captain Melissa Gurile. Gurile most recently earned a double-double in the most recent Fordham matchup, going 4-5 from the foul line earning four blocked shots and 11 rebounds. While the Dayton defense will most likely snap at Gurile's will, this game is a homecoming of sorts for the Pataskala, Ohio native.

Senior co-captain Octavia Thomas tallied 10 points in the Fordham outing and has been one of the strongest offensive assets for the Minutewomen.

Off the bench, freshman Jaywana Bradley has seen increased playing time recently, and even got the nod to start in two of the last four home games.

Junior Steph Mathu leads the Flyers with 12.4 points per game as Stephanie Smith is close behind with 11.6 ppg.

Although a win over Dayton would not be a bench mark accomplishment for UMass, victories count even more as the season draws to a close. After this evening, the Minutewomen have only two more regular season games remaining, St. Bonaventure and Rhode Island.

A win over Dayton would be an excellent warmup for the return trip to Amherst next week where URI awaits. Rhode Island, currently the No. 1 squad in the A-10 East, edged out UMass earlier in the season 86-74 and will undoubtedly arrive ready to play. Securing a number one or number two spot in the division is crucial as this would give UMass, currently No. 2 in the East, a bye in the first round of tournament play.

Women's tennis opens spring season

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

As the snowy weather put a damper on many student's plans for a trip home over the long weekend, it also hindered the plans of the Massachusetts women's tennis team, scheduled to face Ivy League opponent Yale on Friday.

The Minutewomen did not make the trip to Connecticut and are in the process of trying to reschedule the meet to a later date.

"It's an important match for us," said head coach Judy Dixon. "I think we were really ready for it."

However UMass will have other things on their minds this week as they prepare to take the trip to Hamilton, N.Y. on Friday for three matches on Saturday and Sunday against Colgate, Vermont, and Duquesne.

The only action the Minutewomen have seen so far in this the upcoming spring season, was in the Cornell Invitational at the beginning of the month where they finished second.

They will be facing three teams, two of which they defeated handily in the past — Vermont and Duquesne.

Vermont will be the first match for UMass this weekend on Saturday, and will try to improve on their 7-2 loss to the Minutewomen during the fall season on Sept. 16.

"I think Vermont is saying that they're really tired of losing to us," said Dixon. "They're hungry, and beating us would be an excellent start to their weekend. We can not take them lightly or I think we'll be in for a long weekend."

Last year at the 1995 New England women's tennis tournament, Vermont finished in second place behind UMass. Look for freshman Abby Wooldridge and sophomore Annie Dandurand to lead the attack for the Catamounts. The pair are the number one and two singles players respectively for Vermont, which finished at a 10-5 mark during the Fall.

UMass will next take on Conference opponent Duquesne who they also defeated last year.

"This match is important for us, because it's against an Atlantic 10 opponent," said Dixon. "It's always important when we play a conference opponent, as we're trying to secure a number four seed for the Atlantic 10 Tournament."

Colgate will be another good match for the Minutewomen as last year they were defeated by them, and are looking for a better outing this time around.

"Practice has been a little bit sloppy," Dixon said. "I'm a little bit nervous about how well we might do."

Senior Liesl Sitton, and sophomore Caroline Steele top the list for singles players for the Minutewomen, as well as combining for the number one doubles pair. They will be counted on highly for UMass this weekend.

"We have to be focused on these matches," said Dixon. "We have to come out ready to go."

Understanding Eating Disorders: Strategies for Friends and Families

Wednesday, February 21, 1996 • 6:30 - 8:30 p.m.
Murray Lincoln Campus Center, UMass
Room 904-08

I think my roommate has an eating disorder.
How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help.
How can I convince her to see a professional?
Who should I suggest.. Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia.
She says it's under control, but I don't think it is.
I'm really afraid... What can I do to help?

If you are concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — An "A-1" day for study and research. Intellectual pursuits are favored over physical feats. You will have no trouble getting someone's approval to enroll in a special course. Put romance on hold for now.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — A family member makes useful suggestions. Careful deliberation will help you decide which moves to make to advance your career. Professional advice could prove very valuable.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Although security has its attractions, you should not allow yourself to get stuck in a rut. Making a big change in business will not be easy; seek expert advice to reduce the possibility of error.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Buying a condo could be a wise investment. Friends will be supportive if your plans are realistic. Seize the initiative in career matters. Your intuition is your best guide when making long-range decisions.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Do not fly off the handle over a misunderstanding. A tactful response will help restore domestic harmony. Finish a major project without further ado.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Break new grounds, with your writing skills or musical talent. Something you launch now will create a ripple effect. Logic only goes so far where romance is concerned. Shower that special someone with TLC.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Powerful ideas sweep your career along on a sea of bright promise. Your opinions carry weight and may provide the glue that holds a business deal together.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) —Your helpful input or career assistance will promote better understanding. Someone you meet in a business setting could be your ideal romantic match.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — A confidential deal will increase your resources substantially. Keep outsiders in the dark. It may be better to bypass a so-called "bargain" when shopping.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — A splendid day lies ahead. You are at your best! Money is available for loans. Take extra steps to protect your valuables. Loved ones prove surprisingly cooperative when asked for a favor. Show appreciation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — Tepid to banking arrangements without further delay. You will be very busy during the next few days. You could be asked to account for joint funds. Keep careful records. Receipts will prove your case.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Wield your authority judiciously and you will earn respect. Work under a cloak of secrecy. Playing the role of confidential advisor will pay off handsomely. Make certain you are in a position to help.

The police and my neighbors have the wrong idea about me. They think I am taking things from them. They know I always return the bicycles and the lawn chairs. I am not a thief. I am a communist. My uncle, Petain, thinks I will outgrow this, but he is embarrassed by me.

I am not only a communist, I am also an illusionist. There are very few of us left. I know it is hopeless to discuss this with the police when they catch me running through the backyards with several lawn chairs at 3 am. I phoned my dad from the station and he said it made him vomit.

I don't believe him because I know he has a very strong stomach.

Last-second steal crushes Rhode Island's upset bid

Carmelo Travieso's steal ends game with final second jam

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE — Following Massachusetts' 77–71 victory over Rhode Island on Jan. 17, several Rams players felt that the next time the two teams met, they could win. In last night's contest between the Minutemen and the Rams, Rhode Island nearly pulled off the upset.

With UMass ahead 67–65 and under two minutes to go, Marcus Camby committed his fourth foul on Preston Murphy, giving the freshman a chance to tie it up. After missing the first from the charity stripe, Murphy sank the second and UMass called a time out.

On the next offensive drive a Tyrone Weeks tip–in gave the Minutemen a 69–66 lead prompting URI to call a time out of its own. After a Tyson Wheeler rebound off of an Antonio Reynolds miss, Thomas tried to drive the lane for URI but missed, with Weeks grabbing the rebound and getting fouled, forcing a one–and–one. The 69 percent foul shooter went to the line with 31.6 seconds left and sank his first attempt making it 70–66.

On the ensuing offensive drive, Wheeler drove the lane but was swatted away by Camby with 28.3 seconds to go. Edgar Padilla was fouled after the rebound forcing the one–and–one, making both to make it 72–66 with 18 seconds left.

URI wouldn't go away, getting one last attempt for the win as with 11.5 seconds left, Murphy nailed a three–pointer to make it a one possession game.

After Carmelo Travieso grabbed the board, he was fouled and earned the one–and–one with 6.4 seconds remaining. But Travieso missed the front end, giving URI one last chance with 5.1 seconds. As Reynolds in–bounded the ball, Travieso came out of nowhere to steal the pass from Wheeler, driving to the basket for a slam with 1.4 seconds on the clock to put the Rams away, giving UMass the 74–69 win.

Weeks was superb off the bench for the Minutemen as Camby was suffering through 7–20 shooting in the field.

"Tyrone stepped in and gave us unbelievable minutes," said UMass Coach John Calipari.

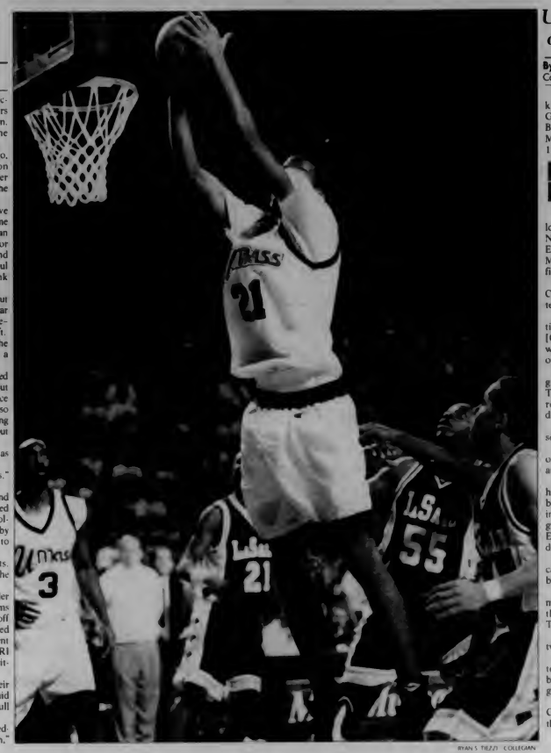
There was one major difference between this game and the last, Camby. The six–foot–eleven inch center missed the first meeting between the two teams due to his collapse prior to the St. Bonaventure game (Jan. 14). Camby didn't have a particularly good game, but he managed to come away with a double–double (25 pts, 13 boards).

"Marcus didn't play all that great, but he still got 25 pts. 13 boards, but that shows you how good of a player he really is," said Calipari.

URI started its comeback as two back–to–back Wheeler three pointers capped off an 8–2 run to bring the Rams within two (51–49). With 8:25 to go, a Murphy lay–up off of a Reynolds steal tied it up at 58. With the score tied again at 60 by a Reynolds basket underneath, UMass went on a mini 5–0 run with four Weeks points, but URI stormed right back to tie it up at 65, setting up the exciting finish.

"Rhode Island played a terrific game, they took their best punch but we played great down the stretch," said Camby. "They played out of their minds and for us to pull off the victory, that feels great."

"Our guys played well enough to win, give Rhode credit they came to play. We did what we had to do to win," Calipari said.



RYAN S. TIEZZI / COLLEGIAN

Marcus Camby and the Minutemen successfully defended their No. 1 ranking against Rhode Island last night.

UMass could return to site of latest win in NCAAs

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE — Normally Rhode Island's men's basketball team plays its home games at the Keaney Gymnasium, which is on campus and holds 4000 fans. But last night's contest versus top ranked and undefeated Massachusetts was held at the Providence Civic Center, a 13,000–plus seat arena, which is also a first round site for this year's NCAA Tournament.

UMass	74
URI	69

The 74–69 win, the 26th straight for the Minutemen was a prelude to what college basketball fans could see in just over three weeks.

Much like an tournament game the crowd had divided loyalties and wasn't quiet for a moment. Also like many NCAA games this game was won at the free throw line. Each team took 26 shots from the charity stripe. The Minutemen hit six more than Rhode Island providing the five point margin.

Along with a 10 rebound advantage UMass coach John Calipari pointed to his team's effort in winning the contest.

"The two biggest plays of the game," he said, "were the tip–in by Tyrone Weeks and Marcus Camby's block on [Chad Thomas]. Those plays were about effort and about wanting to win. We're finding ways to win and that's part of our refuse to lose attitude."

Onlookers called the atmosphere electric, as the game wasn't decided until junior guard Carmelo Travieso stole a Ram inbounds pass with four seconds remaining in the game, and sealed it with a breakaway dunk.

When asked if he would like to come back as the No. 1 seed in the East bracket, Calipari was ambivalent.

"It doesn't matter where we play," he said. "It depends on who follows us in that region. If teams No. 2, 3, and 4 are in the East, I tell you I want to go out west."

For the Rams (15–9, 7–6 in the Atlantic 10), this could have been its ticket to the tournament. Already having beaten Temple and Xavier, as well as an impressive showing in the Rainbow Classic, an upset of UMass would have given URI a huge boost in the selection committee's eyes. Even with the loss Calipari feels Al Skinner's club deserves a shot.

"This game still may help them," he said. "Showing they can play with UMass on national television this can still boost their power ranking."

Rhode Island can still make a late push for a tournament bid as the strength of its schedule still lies ahead of them as games with George Washington, Temple and Texas still remain.

"They don't have to win out," Calipari said. "If they win two of those three, I think they're in."

Recently the Atlantic 10 hasn't been given much in terms of respect. But games such as last night's battle between an up and coming squad and an established program can lay truth to the rise of the Atlantic 10.

"This game is good for us, as well as good for them," Calipari said. "It's good for New England and it's great for the Atlantic 10."

'Hockey Stars' rag gives new info for hockey fans

If the Edmonton Oilers are next to fly south, they'll be leaving behind the best ice surface in the NHL at Northlands Coliseum.

That's just one of many neat tidbits found in Hockey Stars #46, Hockey's Best (and worst).

Tom Kottler on the NHL

Without turning this space into a magazine review, I'd just like to mention that these glossy, bi–monthly rags are an important part of media discourse on the sport. Given the predictable, elementary fluff about hockey spit out by the big American sports magazines that try way too hard to cover all the bases, real fans clamor for something more, and they'll find it here.

However, all is not wine and roses in these pages. Hockey Stars gets a plus for debasing ESPN play–by–play dweeb Gary Thorne as "self–important" and guilty of "often giving misinformation" (can't forget his yelps of "1940 is over!" after the Rangers won the Stanley Cup semifinals), but after reading from cover–to–cover I conclude that it shares many junk opinions with American media, which might like to rename the league the USHL.

This issue only contains three full–length articles, and one is nothing short of a canonization of Devils' coach Jacques Lemaire, whose dome is more golden (It's that New Jersey sun, no?) than chrome. It praises his "system that emphasized teamwork over individual excellence" (read: neutral–zone trap).

In "The Bad Things" section, we find THE TRAP. What gives?

Also in that section is a blurb under the heading "It's no longer Canada's Game." Heck, that's for sure. But turning back to "The Good Things" section, the players named here are all starring in northeastern cities in the U.S — Eric Lindros, Jarmoir Jagr, and Mark Messier. Of course, with barely one quarter of the league's teams playing in Canada, there aren't going to be as many stars up north, but Hockey Stars doesn't seem to mind.

There's a brutal comment about scalpers: "Maybe the death penalty isn't such a bad idea." Hey easy. What's worse, the old Forum made the Good list, in part because of the full houses of 16,259 that always filled it, but you know at least a few thousand of those had to get their tickets from scalpers, and the place would have lost its charm if those seats went unsold. Supply and demand, Hockey Stars, it's as simple as that.

The college poll compiled by the Troy (N.Y.) Record gets props, as it "should be to college hockey what the USA Today poll is to college basketball." I'd ask John Calipari what that is, but we couldn't print his response.

I'd give Cam Neely thumbs up as well, but I wouldn't mistakenly refer to him as the Bruins' captain. If you don't know who that is, time to look for a new job. (I'm not sure everyone at the Associated Press does. In a recent Boston box score sent over the wire, Ray Bourque's name was misspelled "Bork." Three times.)

Hockey Stars did hit one nail on the head. There's a segment called "accessible players," in which is written "hockey players are the nicest athletes in the world."

Last week I covered the Bruins–Whalers tilt in Hartford, the first (of hopefully many more) NHL game I worked as press. I was treated with total respect by the likes of Kyle McLaren, Ted Donato, Bill Ranford and Bourque. Indeed, there seem to be few (if any) Bryan Cox clones in

Hockey wins third straight shoot–out, downs 'Cats

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

In a game that epitomized the frenzied, flip–flopping emotional craziness associated with college hockey, Massachusetts tied New Hampshire 6–6 last night at the Mullins Center, and won the shootout 2–1.

UMass	6
UNH	6

Six times the lead either changed hands or the score was tied in a wacky affair, that saw both the Minutemen (10–16–4, 4–13–4 in Hockey East) and the Wildcats (10–15–4, 6–11–4) mount third period comebacks to secure the draw.

With the crucial three points in the standings, UMass secured a berth in the Hockey East playoffs, eliminating Merrimack.

"We're a little disappointed that we didn't win the game, but we clinched a playoff berth which we're extremely happy about," sophomore netminder Brian Regan said. "It's a double edged sword."

For the second time in as many games against UNH, UMass jumped out early, as they scored just 20 seconds into the contest. Tom Perry picked off a pass, and fed Sal Manganaro for a clean break in on Trent Cavicchi. Manganaro pulled the netminder out of position and slid the puck past him.

After UNH's Eric Bogumiecki tied the game at one 13:02 into the first period, UMass regained the lead on the power play when Dean Canipanale beat Cavicchi with a low 45 foot slap shot at 15:48.

UMass extended the lead to 3–1 2:21 into the second as Manganaro found Gerry Cahill open in the slot for a quick wrist shot.

Regan held his team in the game, as UNH furiously rushed the UMass net for the remainder of the period. Regan made two tremendous glove saves on Eric Nickulas and Derek Bekar just seconds apart mid way through the period, firing up the festive crowd.

Regan was besieged in the second as UNH outshot the Minutemen 20–6 in the period, holding a tremendous territorial advantage. While Regan did all that he could, some shaky defensive marking in front of the net had the goaltender searching for shelter as UNH scored four unanswered goals to take a 5–3 lead after two periods.

The final three of the goals, which came just 3:15 apart, were all scored by untouched players standing in the crease, a situation which offered the embattled Regan no chance.

The pendulum had swung, but UMass coach Joe Mallen made certain that it returned.

"When it was 5–3 we had to not worry about the five goals we gave up, but look at it as being a two goal game and just making sure that we get the next goal to put the pressure back on them," Mallen said. "It's a psychological thing to get them thinking about how it's still just a two goal game.

Minutemen hockey still a thrill ride

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

In the summer months, the best roller coaster in Western Massachusetts is in Agawam, but if you can't wait until Memorial Day and the opening of Riverside Park, Massachusetts hockey from time to time can serve as a suitable substitute.

For the Minutemen the ride started on a high note. Perhaps building off of Saturday night's shootout win over these same Wildcats, the Minutemen came out strong, cruising to a 3–1 lead.

Like any thrill ride however, the dip was bound to come.

And when it came, it was a rough one. In the second period, the Minutemen fell far and fast. The Wildcats scored four unanswered goals to turn a two goal UMass lead into a 5–3 advantage for the visitors.

The ride wasn't over though. The Minutemen began their ascent back up early in the third period. The same Minutemen, who would fold when faced with a late deficit in their less mature days, stormed back in the third.

After former Springfield Pic Rob Bonneau cut the lead to 5–4 just 1:55 into the final stanza, another ex–Pic got into the act.

Divided SGA supports ALANA voting rights

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

In what proved to be a tense and divisive meeting, the Student Government Association Senate struck down a attempt to repeal the voting power of the ALANA caucus, Wednesday night.

Speaker Dan Castellano said he ruled the motion, which would have amended the SGA Constitution, dilatory, meaning that it could not be debated or voted on because it "was not brought forward in the best interests of the Senate."

A simple majority is required to overturn the Speaker's ruling, which Sen. Peter Luongo and Sen. Dan Kittredge, the motion's co–authors, failed to produce.

If passed, the motion would have eliminated the voting rights for ALANA caucus Senators, which represents thirteen percent of the entire Senate body.

Luongo and Kittredge took exception to the fact that these Senator's are not elected by a standard constituency.

"We feel that it is wrong for the Senate to appoint representatives. We need to have a fair representation of campus," said Kittredge.

"This would never be allowed at the state or federal level," added Luongo. "We're doing this for principle."

Luongo and Kittredge said that the caucus allots a disproportionate amount of power to the ALANA community within the Senate. They cited in the motion the fact that ALANA students can already become Senators through the general election process.

"[The caucus] is not solving any problems," said Luongo.

"This is reverse discrimination," said Kittredge.

In what was a emotional and heated statement, Castellano accused the Senators of confusing their personal politics with the students best interests.

"This motion is anti–student," said Castellano. "Your actions are motivated by racial ignorance."

Castellano feared that this motion would divide the Senate into partisan factions, as opposed to its traditional and intended pro–student stance.

In addition, Castellano said that this motion was misdirected to the Senate floor and should be heard by the Student Judiciary.

"This is a constitutional issue," said Castellano.

Sen. Lawrence Plano, a supporter of the motion, disagreed with the Speaker, citing the fact that Legal Services recommended that it be heard in the legislative, not judicial, forum.

Further, Plano objected to the manner in which the Speaker ruled on the motion and said that Castellano had over–stepped the boundaries of his power.

"This is about the Speaker not allowing you to hear a motion," said Plano to the Senate.

"He's supposed to be a arbitrary facilitator of the Senate," Plano said. Instead, Castellano "swore and verbally attacked other Senator's."

While Castellano had no comment on his choice of language, he did not deny that he deliberated targeted Luongo and Kittredge. He saw their actions as yet another attempt to disempower ALANA student at the University.

"I think that if we didn't have the caucus, we wouldn't have equal representation," said Castellano. "It's not like the implementation of this caucus has hurt the Senate."

Castellano cited President Christine Lopes and Student Trustee Dan Rivera as two of the most significant and positive contributions of the ALANA caucus to the Senate.

Castellano refuted Plano's accusations by saying that it is the Speakers obligation to offer a detailed reason to the Senate to justify his ruling of a motion dilatory.

Sen. Jennifer Casasanto and Sen. David Weaver, who co–chair the Senate–Select Caucus Committee, supported Castellano's decision, accusing Luongo and Kittredge of being "racists."

"They vote their personal views and that's not right," said Casasanto.

Weaver said that the ALANA caucus symbolizes a "pro–student action to fix a problem in society." The caucus was originally created, he said, to reverse the fact that historically, few ALANA students were voted into the Senate.

ALANA students "should have the ability to be represented and empowered," Weaver said.

Luongo and Kittredge took offense to being labeled racists and said that the motion was about the legitimacy of forming a caucus and not specifically about ALANA students.

"If we believe in equality, we should exemplify equality," said Kittredge.

Luongo and Kittredge are already in the process of filing a case with the Student Judiciary to resolve the matter.

UM engineering alums give job tips

In celebration of National Engineer's Week, University engineering graduates held a panel discussion yesterday about the prospective environment engineering students will encounter upon graduation.

"UMass Graduates: World Class People, World Class Solutions" was sponsored by the College of Engineering and the Engineering Alumni Association.

"In our business, either you innovate and grow or you die," said Daniel F. Desmond, president of the electro–optical division of Kollmorgen.

"As engineers, you work to solve today's problems," said Systems Engineer for Lockheed Sanders Leslie K. Jelalian.

All panel members agreed that it is not simply a matter of being an engineer, but of being a part of a team.

Future MVP engineers need to follow the following guidelines according to Desmond — pick your fun career path, adopt continuous lifetime learning, innovate designs, products and processes and develop people skills.

"You just need to have some kind of desire," said Anthony Curd, assistant town engineer for the Department of Public Works. "Don't be pressured to be fitted into a mold."

Curd stressed that someone can always make a living doing something they like.

"Believe that you have to learn constantly," Desmond said in reference to the topic lifetime learning. "Your education doesn't end here at the University.

"By getting an education and staying current," people will succeed intellectually, Jelalian said in reference to lifetime learning. People must communicate, cooperate, integrate and be able to work in teams, she said.

"You absolutely need people skills," Curd said on the topic of developing people skills. "If you're not out to serve people, your fire is out."

He said that a few engineering ideas have died because of personality conflicts and lack of presentation skills when it comes time to sell a product to a company.

You don't solve a problem by yourselves, therefore, you need interpersonal skills, Jelalian said. A strong character is needed as part of the team decision making, Curd added.

"The kind of person that is valued in the world is one who gets the job done" without compromising the quality of the finished product, said Director of Process Certification at Pratt & Whitney John G. Whitehead.

Whitehead advised engineering students within the audience to "try to get as many certifications and licenses as you can." These will certify you as an expert and can even give you legal protection, he added.

"Go after what you like and know how to deal with people without compromising your ideals," Curd said.

"Engineering is more than developing a product," Desmond added.

Panel members called upon the engineering department to provide more hands on experience for their students other than internships.

Jewish poet talks at Hillel dinner

By Marni E. Heffner
Collegian Staff

As Hillel welcomed the new month of Adar this past Tuesday night, Merle Feld graced the holiday with a talk and poetry reading.

Feld, a well–known poet, addressed the issues of women's lives, being a traditional Jew, having children, generational issues, women's spirituality and Israeli–Palestinian relations.

After serving for several years as a visiting faculty member at numerous universities, including University of Connecticut and Princeton University, Feld spent a year in Israel, where she was a visiting faculty member at the Prade's Institute in Jerusalem.

A dinner was held shortly before the reading at the Faculty Club, where Feld gathered together with a group of jewish women from campus. Over a dinner of penne pasta in Gorgonzola sauce, Feld discussed how she created her own "traditional" Judaism, living in Israel and facilitating discussion groups for Israeli and Palestinian women.

Discussing what makes a person a "traditional" Jew, Feld said, "I have as much right to say I'm traditional as someone who has payes. What does traditional mean to me? I observe Shabbat... I have a kosher home, I go to services,... you add it all up and it's traditional."

Feld also talked about the similarities between being a Jew and being a feminist. "Women have a different way of being in the world. A man's way of being is seen as normative and we try to fit into it," Feld said. "The notion of finding your own voice is one important contribution that feminists have made — it's important to women, it's important to men."

Feld read her work from several anthologies and discussed why she became a writer. One topic brought up was the Israeli–Palestinian women's discussion groups. In commenting on how little the audience knew about Judaism, but how much they knew about the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, Feld said, "I think it's very hard to understand how unlikely it seemed then, to get where we are now."

Legislation may speed up FDA approval

By Lauran Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Legislation forcing the Food and Drug Administration to rule on new drugs in as few as four months could endanger Americans' health, FDA Commissioner David Kessler warned senators Wednesday.

"We are approving drugs in very short time frames, and one day we are going to make a mistake," Kessler told a Senate committee that began debating how to revamp the agency.

The FDA is responsible for ensuring Americans get safe and effective medicine, as well as safe food, cosmetics and other products.

The issue is whether the FDA approves new products fast enough — and how it can help medical manufacturers speed up drug development so it doesn't take 12 to 15 years between discovering a new medicine and selling it.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., has introduced legislation to force the FDA to review all "breakthrough" drugs for killer or untreatable diseases in four months, two months faster than today.

Every other product, from a fat substitute for foods to a competitor for existing drugs, would be reviewed within six months.

The FDA would have to meet those deadlines by 1998 or farm out its work to private companies. The bill also would allow companies to petition for automatic U.S. sale of any therapy that is approved in certain foreign countries if the FDA misses its deadline. The FDA then would have 30 days to block the sale, by declaring the treatment unsafe or unproven.

Senators said such provisions were long overdue.

The FDA has "an arrogant attitude, saying 'we can't trust Europeans, we can't trust the Japanese' to approve drugs, said Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind. "We end up costing lives because products don't get to market in time."

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., asked: "If we can use NATO weapons, why can't we use drugs from NATO countries?"

Kessler disagreed, arguing that FDA has frequently uncovered problems missed abroad. For example, when the FDA rejected the blood pressure medicine dilevodol in 1989 because it caused fatal liver disease, Britain and other countries already selling the drug banned it.

And he said the strict review deadlines mean either a dangerous drug could slip through, or that FDA would reject promising drugs that could have passed muster with a little more time to ask questions.

Today, the FDA spends six months reviewing breakthrough drugs and 16 months reviewing nonessential medicines. Medical devices take much longer, an average of 20 months for the most complicated ones like mechanical heart valves.

But the FDA has set some records, approving the latest AIDS therapy in just 97 days. Why, senators asked, can't the FDA do all therapies that fast?

The FDA lets drugs for killer diseases be approved without final proof of how well they work, but won't take that big of a risk just to let a company sell a competing drug that offers no advantage over existing medicine, he responded.

Family planning goes on–line; Western Mass. to benefit

By Melanie B. Arruda

A network of health services offered by the Family Planning Council (FPC) is made accessible via the agency's new World Wide Web home page.

"The new site will provide an increasingly important new communications link between the FPC and a rapidly growing number of people in western Massachusetts — and around the world," said Leslie Laurie, executive director of FPC.

"We want to be in a place where we are accessible to our clients," she added.

The Council's World Wide Web (WWW) site consists of information and graphics about the agency's services, educational materials, press releases and back issues of FPC newsletters, plus an up–to–date electronic newsletter with the latest news about the their activities and related public affairs issues.

We offer "reproductively focused health services" in all our 12 medical sites serving the four nearby counties, Laurie said.

Health services offered by the agency include access to birth control services and HIV testing, a statewide hotline for HIV information and Women and Infant (WIC) Feeding Program, through which food is made available to eligible pregnant women and families.

Educational materials include fact sheets about treatment for different conditions such as PMS, and information about diaphragms and birth control, Laurie said.

Information from press releases at the site come from educational programs, a map with sites of health centers, and access to links to other organizations.

Driver's failure to heed crosswalk law causes minor accident

Police are continuing to investigate an accident that took place in the crosswalk at Presidents Drive on Tuesday afternoon, when a pedestrian from Northampton was hit.

University of Massachusetts graduate student Matthew Zapruder, 29, of 12 School Street, Northampton was treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital for a separated shoulder. He was taken to the hospital after complaining of pain at the scene of the accident.

Zapruder was struck by a vehicle operated by University student Dawn Meyers, of 152 Hinsdale Rd., Windsor. While waiting at the crosswalk, he went to cross the street after a vehicle stopped.

Meyers passed the stopped vehicle and hit Zapruder. She was cited for failing to yield for a pedestrian in a crosswalk. The citation carries a $100 fine. Also, the vehicle's windshield was cracked because of the collision.

"Once a pedestrian has entered the crosswalk, the traffic must stop," said Phil Cavanaugh, the associate director of University Police Department. "A lot of people do not realize the law."

Female scientists targeted in D.C.

By Amy Phillips
Collegian Correspondent

At a National Science Foundation (NSF) conference held in Washington, D.C. this past December, University of Massachusetts Professor of Paleomtology Laurie Godfrey was given the unique opportunity to represent women in science.

The impetus of the conference was to encourage women to enter the science fields. Godfrey spoke about her involvement in a NSF program entitled "Visiting Professorships in Science."

The NSF offers up to 20 grants per year, and Godfrey's application netted her visiting professorship program $150,000. During the 1994–95 academic year, she conducted research, classes and professional lectures in the Anatomical Science Department at the State University of New York at Stony Brook. Fifteen graduate students participated in the research on the evolutionary development and speciation of Madagascar lemurs.

Her other role at Stony Brook was to encourage young women who are entering the fields of science.

"The Visiting Professorship program enables women in science to be more visible and to encourage female participation," Godfrey said. She expressed concern over the "tremendous shortage of women in some fields of science."

Speaking from experience, she said feels that there are still disciplines considered to be male dominions which may intimidate young women. For example, as an undergraduate at Tufts, Godfrey said she encountered a professor who did not approve of women in geology.

Since then, Godfrey has led field work in Madagascar for the past 10 years and has collected thousands of bones of extinct lemur species. She said she finds this work exciting, and hopes her research will help scientists in speciation research of other animal families.

Godfrey has published many articles on lemur evolution and speciation in such journals as Natural History and American Journal of Primatology and has been an associate editor for Journal of Human Revolution and American Journal of Physical Anthropology. She began her teaching career at UMass in 1977 after receiving her doctorate from Harvard.

about services, but also makes people aware of legislation that affects our work. Such public issues include legislation for funding for prevention and medical services for people with HIV or AIDS, according to Laurie.

"We are trying to make this a jumping off point," she said.

The WWW site for the FPC's 25 health centers and satellite clinics is not the agency's first introduction into cyberspace. A gopher site was created for the Family Planning Councils of America (FPCA) by FPC Web designer Alwin Schmidt. The FPCA is made up of the nation's larger family planning agencies. The gopher site introduces users to important information on national family planning issues and connects them to other relevant sources on the Internet.

The FPCA Gopher has a menu that lists sites on the Internet with resources of interest to the nation's family planning community. These include monthly updated sites about medical and health information, as well as information on government, advocacy, social services, grant-related resources, and on health, population and economic issues. By selecting the menu item one wants, anyone using the Gopher site from their own computer can "burrow" directly to the Internet site listed.

"With limited resources we were really glad to piece this together," Laurie said.

The Gopher site can be seen as "an electronic library that is a card catalogue," Schmidt said. "It is a tool that points to things." He explained that it makes information searches easier.

Schmidt is currently working on a WWW site for the FPCA that will include information about all FPC's across the country. He said he hopes it will be online by April.

"The ease and confidentiality to access service will make it easier to deal with these intimate issues," Laurie said. "We just invite people to come visit. We hope that it is a resource used by people in Western Massachusetts."

Hampshire College gave FPC the computer access to do the work necessary in developing a WWW site. Hampshire senior Peter Couvares did the initial computer work that laid the groundwork for FPC's site.

For more information about the FPC WWW site or the FPCA gopher site, contact fpcweb@family.hampshire.edu.

Opinion/Editorial

Choose or lose

A recent poll by The Washington Post and the Kaiser Family Foundation revealed that two-thirds of Americans surveyed were unsure as to who their representative was or whether that person was a Republican or a Democrat. In fact, many US citizens cannot name some of the nation's most important leaders.

However this ignorance on the part of the uninformed is not as tragic as the immense apathy expressed by active political observers. As the caucus and primary season begins, the attitude of voters is abundantly apparent. Lack of enthusiasm for any candidate, including the President, is seen everywhere. This jaded voter mood is nothing new. In election after election, many people believe that it really doesn't matter who's elected president — that it would just be more of the same. The lack of interest in the present field of candidates by those who do vote may cause havoc in the political arena. When apaths is king, who wins?

Erin Barnes

If "Campaign '96" follows present trends, one clear loser is the environment. With an enthusiastic, new Congress eager to strip off layers of environmental regulation, activists might expect to find the landscape at year's end strewn with fallen timber, industrial waste and endangered species. However this is an election year, and the environment has more staying power as a political issue than the House of Representatives may have anticipated. Even House Speaker Newt Gingrich claims that Republicans are strategically out of position on the environment. The regulatory reform strategy encompassed by the GOP quickly deteriorated into an environmental issue and cost the party crucial points in the public eye. Polls confirm that the American public, while leery of over-regulation, still places a premium on clean air, water and soil. All of the environmental battles of 1995 remain to be fought to conclusion this year during an election cycle that will challenge the staying power of both Clinton and the Republican candidates.

• President Clinton: Recently, the Clinton administration has reasserted its voice on environmental matters. Vice President Al Gore, Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt and Environmental Protection Agency head Carol Browner have been articulate defenders of common-sense regulation. The president has vetoed sharp cuts in EPA and Interior funding and had opposed the opening of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil exploration. All of this is important and encouraging although the administration may have to compromise further to end budgetary gridlock. Reforms on mining laws and grazing policies in the West remain elusive goals. As the next national election approaches, partisan on both sides are just as likely to harden positions as they are to concede some ground.

• Bob Dole: Dole has sought the presidency for 20 years and this is likely his last shot at office. The essence of his campaign message is that the nation needs solidity, not flash. It needs a stand-up guy in the White House, someone to stolidly get things done. On the environment, he sponsored legislation that would have required the federal government to reimburse landowners whose property values fall as a result of regulation. Many of Dole's positions reflect the pragmatic, small-town conservatism he grew up with. If elected, this attitude may endanger an issue area that has only gained momentum in the past 25 years.

• Pat Buchanan: For this hard-driving conservative populist, there's right and wrong, black and white and little room for compromise. Of all the issues, economic nationalism has become the theme of Buchanan's second long-shot run at the Oval Office. On the environment, Buchanan would disband the federal Bureau of Land Management and would turn the vast lands under their control over to the states. In addition, he would have Congress, not the administration, decide which species are endangered. Since he has never been elected to office, some voters may shy away from his lack of experience. However, after finishing a strong second in the Iowa caucus, Buchanan, unfortunately, is one to watch.

• Steve Forbes: As one of the richest men in America, Forbes likes to portray himself as the outsider taking on the political establishment. And his wealth is the key as his deep pockets will keep him in the game as long as he decides to play. On the environment, this Empower America member backs a law requiring the government to compensate people whose property values are lowered as a result of regulation. Forbes also believes that nature, not smokestacks, create much of the acid rain that falls in Nova England. If elected, he would rein in the excesses of the EPA and would consider cuts in environmental regulations.

The sudden rise of Forbes in the race for the Republican presidential nomination may well be the latest manifestation of the American public's enduring discontent with the state of Washington politics. Frustrated by government shutdowns and grumbling politicians, the public has once again listened to the calls of an outsider. Thus, the primaries are exposing fault lines within the Republican party. As in 1992, a three-way race favors the incumbent. As the lesser of all evils, that means good news for environmental protection.

Our voices and votes carry much weight as a democratic nation. In terms of what's important to us, we must be heard come election day.

One day over the winter break, I was hanging over at my friend's house. We were bored out of our skulls, so we were actually pleased when his mother asked us to go grocery shopping for her. She was sick in bed with the flu, so that was another good reason to do her the favor.

The thing was, she was annoying when it came to grocery shopping. I believe in coupons — they're in my blood. I believe in saving monies, since there's no one better to learn from than my dad. But alphabetizing coupons by the product is not my idea of a pleasurable time.

So, after getting to know the Sunday newspaper better than planned, we were ready. Greg carried the coupons in the obnoxious little pouch his mother gave us, and I took the money. The five twenty's in my pocket was the most money I had in my pocket since the night of my first communion.

We got to the market and began searching for the items on the list. In what seemed like three weeks later, we were in line to pay. An older lady was in front of us, paying off her bill while continuing to put her stuff onto the conveyor belt.

We began to place our two filled carriages of food onto the belt. The man behind the register tallied up our bill, which came out to some $84. I reached into my back pocket, and took out the money. One of the twenty's fell to the floor. So I continued my motion in giving the four twenty's to the cashier and reached down to get the other one. Just as I did, I watched the lady in front of me scoop up the $20 bill, and stuff it into her pocket.

I looked at her as if she was joking and asked her with a half-smile what the hell she was doing.

"What do you mean what am I doing," the lady said.

"You just took my $20 bill," I yelled.

"No, I did not," she said.

"Bryce, just give her the money," Greg said.

"Greg, I swear to God, she just took the friggin' twenty," I angrily said. I looked over at the cashier, who blankly stared at me. "Get me the manager."

Even though I came to the realization before he arrived to the scene that he would not be able to do anything about the situation, I still felt the need to vent. He said he could not prove she stole the money, so he could not retrieve it for me. He said the market would cover the difference.

By that time, I was totally pissed off. As we walked out of the supermarket, I kept my eyes on the kleptomaniacal little wench. I watched as she put her bags into her station wagon and walked into the department store right next to the market.

We packed up the car, and began to exit the parking lot. I was fuming.

"Stop the car," I told Greg.

"What are you gonna' do, Bryce — "

"Stop the car, Greg."

He stopped the car behind the lady's station wagon. Not knowing what I was about to do but knowing I was going to do something, I ran up to her car. I tried to open the front door, but it was locked. The back door was unlocked, so I opened it up, took her groceries, threw them into Greg's car and jumped in as we sped off.

I stole her groceries. I didn't slash her tires. I didn't smash any windows. I stole her groceries. I'm not a bad ass, as you can probably tell, but it gave me a sense of invincibility. What's more is that when we got home, we were curious to see what was in the lady's bags. You know what was in her bags?

Full of bologna, just like that whole story.

Digital dilemma

Jedediah Curtis

We are the hapless victims of a cruel conspiracy which this editorial will address. I am referring to the compact disc. This so-called technological break-through is actually a symptom of our unconscious participation in allowing our humanity to walk the plank. Like the automobile and other aberrations, the compact disc puts its naysayers at a decided disadvantage. Almost all new music is released on compact disc, but very little now is released on vinyl. We do not challenge this trend, but instead follow it by purchasing new compact disc players and replacing all our tapes and records with compact discs. We are told that this is the prudent thing to do. Who tells us this? The people selling the technology.

There is a certain type of photograph which is composed of tiny dots which are a senseless blur when viewed up close. As the viewer moves farther away, the dots begin to fuse into some semblance of an image. But our eyes know that something is missing. This is the same principle the compact disc operates on. Something like 50,000 units of sound is sampled each second, and on the compact disc in an attempt at tricking us into thinking we are hearing music. But there are gaps between these sampled sounds, and we instinctively notice them. Simply put, the compact disc has no soul. This may sound like a paranoid conspiracy theory, but a better analogy would be a voice crying in the wilderness. We have become passive guinea pigs for technology. But not everyone is willing to be exploited. For example, Neil Young, one of our foremost musicians, has been vociferous in his denouncement of compact discs. In his younger days, Neil recorded with analog equipment, where the sound is continuous. When compact discs came into vogue he recognized their feebleness in comparison with analog technology. The aural skills of a musician of Neil's status are honed to a high level. We should listen to him and like-minded pilgrims in their denouncement of the pernicious and opprobrious compact disc.

Technology in itself is not necessarily bad, but it can be alienating. For example, the pedestrian is at a decided disadvantage in today's society with the epidemic outbreak of automobiles. They are left in the dust of others' cars. This dust is actually exhaust composed of lethal carbon monoxide. If the pedestrian happens to be walking along the roadside, the ultimate irony occurs. They breathe the noxious car fumes while the motorist is safe in the haven of the car. Additionally, the pedestrian's ears are assaulted by a cacophonous roar from the horseless carriages. If this pedestrian's ears are barraged in this fashion too much s/he may lose hearing ability and aural discrimination, which may lead to the purchase of compact discs. It is no surprise that most of today's motorists install compact disc players in their vehicles since the evils of cars and compact discs complement each other.

This editorial is not intended as a Unabomber-esque battle cry to eliminate all our technology. Rather, it is an appraisal of our current conformist tendencies. By uncritically accepting everything industry dangles in front of us we become like the dog in Pavlov's experiment. This makes industry happy because it justifies their production of more paltry contraptions. But it makes the earth unhappy because the pollution from these abominations is deleterious. Compact discs most certainly irritate our solar system. Philosophers have long spoken of the music of the spheres, produced from the harmonious resonance of celestial planets. These planets are being subjected to a sudden influx of digital sounds from compact discs. What if this hubbub interferes with the purity of the music of the spheres to such an extent that a planet spins off its axis and crashes into earth? The lorax speaks for the trees for the trees have no tongues. I do not intend to put words in the mouth of the universe, but I shall be so bold as to speak on behalf of our solar system in suggesting that we reconsider our relationship to technology.

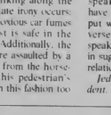
Buchanan's bigotry



Henry J. Brier

Old man winter, replete with brisk winds and accumulating snow, coupled with the results of the political festivities in the neighboring state to the northeast, is enough to dramatically remove one from parts faraway and orient awareness towards the unfolding tableau in the United States.

The Republican voters in that state, who went to the polls in record numbers, have spoken, leaving the political observer with questions, such as: New Hampshire, what are you thinking?

The name of the winner of the first-in-the-nation primary hardly merits this very print. His identity is obvious, while his bustile methods and abrasive manner are well-known. His campaign is orchestrated by figures who have a shady past and a seedy following, to put it nicely.

The Republican constituency in the "Live Free or Die" state have paved his way, relocating him and his once extreme outer-fringe message from the ignored abyss to the societal mainstream. He has become a force to be approached and challenged head-on.

His ascension to the point this past Tuesday should really have been expected, after having posed a serious threat to then-President George Bush in the same state's primary in 1992.

That year, his campaign's negative advertisements circled around Bush's infamous rescinding of the tax pledge. This incessant pounding of the incumbent resulted in the softening which helped provide for Bush's downfall months later in November. To the man who defeated Bush with his help and who currently sits in the Oval Office as the first term dwindles, the crystal-clear message is strikingly apparent: Watch your back.

Similarly negative mudslinging tactics were used this year, as his campaign was largely based on denigration and defamation. This, evidently, is admirable, according to the constituency of the state which, as of 8 p.m. Tuesday night, is no longer nationally important.

As recent as this past week, he unabashedly stood by and remained loyal to his suspended campaign cochairman who is widely reputed to have close ties to staunchly anti-government militias and white supremacist organizations.

This disreputable individual took a perhaps temporary step back the day before yet another similarly-minded campaign organizer was removed. Likewise, this second individual also has ties to an organization touting a white supremacist ideology, as she led an offshoot of the Ku Klux Klan.

That's two campaign power-players, both suspended and removed within two days of one-another and within a week of when voters cast preferences in the primary.

The "guilt by association" belief has been downplayed despite the undisputed fact that these two aforementioned individuals held powerful and formative leadership roles within his campaign.

If the ideas and ties of these kind of people, who happened to have been exposed, are in fact developing and sustaining his campaign, making key decisions and succeeding, what kind of people would run his administration and, in effect, the country?

He himself has a long and documented track record of anti-Semitic statements and actions, complementing his Nazi sympathizing: Charges which when levelled against him, are neither refuted nor denied.

Some may argue that only a few percentage points proved to be the deciding factor which granted him victory. But still, the State of New Hampshire, as indicated by their sole opportunity to find themselves in the spotlight, has democratically opted to align its political aspirations with a militant and prejudiced isolationist.

What is more is that he, and the rest of the candidates, have now all but evaporated from New Hampshire, after having flipped pancakes, walked across the state, hung out with dogs and described the supposed influx of "peasants" now charging the White House with "pitchforks."

They will only return when they need to, and that will be a little less than four years from now.

Then they, in addition to assorted others, will once again attempt to convince the New Hampshire constituency that they each have all of the answers.

Listen closely and critically to his message. He's honest, up-front and concise.

And he needs to be confronted, especially when his ideas and theories challenge the main tenet of this country, and, ironically, reminiscent of the New Hampshire motto: The Land of the Free.

To shop or not to shop?

I am proud to admit that I am a product of the Mall Generation.

Name a store in a mall that I frequent, and I can tell you what floor it's on, what side of the aisle it's on and how many cash registers it has.

This does not necessarily mean I am a mall-a-holic. I don't attend weekly meetings to tell a group of strangers, "My name is Laura and I have a shopping problem. It all started at this Abercrombie & Fitch sale..."

We all know that malls serve as more than mere locations for merchants to peddle their wares to credit card wielding consumers. Since the first mall was erected, shopping as a concept has been revolutionized. As today's malls (or more appropriately "shopping arenas") continue to grow and change, so does our society.

We grew up in malls, and malls are growing up around us. Our generation is witnessing one of the most rapid paces of mall construction and reconstruction of all time. Big malls boomed in the '80s, and business is still flourishing today.

The world of malls was rocked here in Massachusetts last month when it was announced that Boston's original department store, Jordan Marsh, will now be called Macy*s, as per their recent purchase. I was among those saddened by the imminent break. In tradition, for my earliest shopping memories surround Jordan Marsh. When I was just a toddler, my mother would take me along to Jordan's, where we'd always end the day with a stop at their bakery for a coconut macaroon with a cherry on top (sigh).

The mall bug that had bitten me early on continued to satiate itself on my habits, for I was fortunate enough to live in a hotbed of mall development. The first mall built east of the Mississippi, the second in America, was the open-air Shopper's World mall of Framingham, Mass.

A mere 20 minutes away from my house, this particular mall holds a special place in my heart as it was the location of my first kiss. Much to my sadness, Shopper's World was demolished last summer to make way for a chain of new stores and the remodeled expansion of the neighboring Natick Mall.

My teenage shopping experiences are hardly unique. Whether you're male or female, if you lived anywhere within the vicinity of a mall growing up, you probably spent a large portion of your pubescent years prowling around like a mallrat. Mom dropped you off, you w i n - dow-shopped for about an hour, stuffed your face with burritos from the food court and gossiped with friends.

As a society who loves to blame things, should we consider it the mall's fault for molding us into a greedy and materialistic generation? I don't think so. If anything, we learned about economics, sale tactics and how to get a good bargain. I'm sure that along with the developing shop-a- holics, some mallrats were also burgeoning businesspeople.

Malls have become more and more elaborate as we have aged, and for the right price, will cater to our every whim. You can do anything at the mall. Have dinner, see a movie, exercise on those Health Riders, drop kids off at the nursery so you can shop in peace... the list is endless.

So maybe we are a little spoiled, but we are older and wiser now. My mall habits have changed. No longer do I wander aimlessly through crowds, dreamily window shopping. I shop with specific goals in mind, a n d I know the best times and the best places to go. There is a method to my mall madness, usually involving a once-around browse, comparative shopping and a final purchase spree. If you don't like my style, fine — I like to shop alone.

EXAMINING THE PROS, CONS & CONCEPTS OF AMERICA'S LOVE IT OR LEAVE IT PLACE DU JOUR

Five Dirty Little Words

Five words that I hope I never hear again — "wanna go to the mall?" I would rather flunk a test, eat at the Dining Common, live under the tyrannical rule of Pat Buchanan, anything at all, just don't ask me to spend time at the mall.

Every mall should be nicknamed "The Dead Mall" because it is the perfect name for this wicked institution. It is slowly killing away local businesses and allowing corporate moguls like Media Play and K-Mart to horde our money so they can take over the world.

Am I cynical? Obviously, but with good reason. I dread walking down the aisles of mall passing pretentious stores like J. Crew, Gap, Filene's, Brookstone and Victoria's Secret. Every time I even set foot in a store nasty stares by snobbish employees are thrown my way. "Can I help you." Each time I feel like screaming, "Yes you can — leave me alone."

I don't like Big Brother Gap looking over my shoulder as I choose between two styles of khaki pants. Yeah, that guy in the $200 outfit may have style, but not my style, so leave me be and attack some other innocent bystander who just wants to shop.

How can someone spend an entire day strolling through a mall? Window shopping is like teasing your stomach with food. Yeah, you see it, but no, you can't have it (unless you have daddy's gold card.) Malls are easily an example of American culture at it's ultimate worst. On the outside everything is sparkling and glossy but deep down it is all a part of a corrupt capitalistic world where greed dictates all.

Take a look at Media Play. Sure they have a large selection of books, videos and music

Why do men hate malls?

I do not understand men's aversion to malls. Rather I should say, I don't understand most men's aversion to malls. There are a dying breed of males that really do enjoy shopping and going to malls — my friend Adam is someone I converted into a mall connesseur.

This is a guy who at one time would rather be dragged naked through the desert than go to the mall with me, but after careful nurturing and persistent trips he came to love the place. Every time I call him when I'm home he's always there. And contrary to popular beliefs a frontal lobotomy was not needed.

My friend Chris is a shop-a-holic and no, he isn't gay either. He just believes that buying clothes doesn't entail a) mom or b) gifts. He believes it the power of picking out stuff he likes by himself and for himself. He has clothing that he can wear for occasions that call for casual chic. He is not limited to tee-shirts and jeans. He does not have to borrow a shirt and tie. He owns a shirt and tie.

But this is rare and for many men, considered a genetic deformity.

One Stop Shopping

I think a man's aversion to the mall and shopping involves their minds and the fact that "one stop shopping" is a concept that has been integrated into them from birth. The joys of browsing and window gazing are lost on males. They want something, they go to the mall, they find the store, they leave. End of story. While some see this as a good thing, in reality it is a serious impediment. You see with this mentality comes the lost concept of bargaining.

A man is in such a hurry to be in and out (and sometimes this doesn't only apply to shopping as many women know) that they pay more money than needed for items that could be had at half

People no longer have to drive to mega malls and superstores to go shopping — they can simply turn on their computers.

With the proliferation of the Internet anyone with a computer, a modem, an Internet account and, of course, a credit card can go shopping on-line. In the past on-line shopping was relegated to on-line services such as Prodigy and America On-line, but with the growth of the World Wide Web on-line shopping is coming to the masses.

In the movie The Net Sandra Bullock's character, Angela Bassett, ordered a plane ticket and a pizza across the Internet. Most people simply dismissed that as fiction, but Pizza Hut actually offers such a service, while airlines have sold tickets on-line for years. Entrepreneurs are flocking to the Net to sell anything from computers to bedding and even art.

Cybershop

There are tons of places on the Web to shop from depending upon your tastes. My first stop was Cybershop, an on-line department store at http://www2.cybershop.com/cybershop/online.

Cybershop was easy to use, and aesthetically pleasing to the eye with tons of bright, colorful graphics. The easiest way to search for items was using the forms search which includes keywords and even brand names. The forms search operates like most World Wide Web search engines such as Webcrawler.

All star cast liven up soundtrack

Vedder, Khan create music to live by; Rocketship sets mark

VARIOUS ARTISTS
Dead Man Walking Soundtrack
Columbia

For those of you who have viewed the film, you know the myriad of emotions that are elicited: Rage, joy, sorrow and most of all — uncertainty. Because of this, it is only fitting that the soundtrack should follow the same pattern.

It opens up with Bruce Springsteen's "Dead Man Walking" which was recently nominated for an Oscar, an award he won before with his song "Streets of Philadelphia." Once again The Boss has managed to capture the feeling and mood of a tor mented and lost soul.

All of the artist on the sound track compliment each other in a weird way, from Johnny Cash to Lyle Lovett and Suzanne Vega to Mary Chapin Carpenter, each song has a decidedly eerie tone to it, with tales of sorrow and woe interlaced with a catchy country-esque melodies. Both of Tom Waits' contributions — "The Fall of Troy" and "Walk Away" — add an extra touch of loneliness with his hauntingly unplaceable voice and rambling lyrics.

But the tunes that will stand out most in your mind will be the collaborations of Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan and Eddie Vedder. Ali Khan is perhaps the greatest Qwalli singer alive and his Sufie influences click magically with Vedder's throats mumbling "The Face of Love" is by far the best track on the album combining etherial chants with modern sensibilities over-laced with a sitar.

The Dead Man Walking Soundtrack is like an excellent dish to an impressive main course. A (Tara McGinley)

ROCKETSHIP
A Certain Smile, A Certain Sadness
Slumberland

Far removed from the mainstream music world there exists a close knit niche self-described as indie pop or twee. It is an obscure land where record sales number in the hundreds, record covers are often hand drawn and obsessed collectors scurry around buying up records by bands such as Bis, the Softies and Holidae.

In many eyes, Rocketship is the guiding light in this counter culture where catchy pop songs are the name of the game. Look at the indie pop mailing list on the Internet where Rocketship has won "Best song" two years in a row in their annual poll. Not bad for a band that prior to this fall might had only five released songs.

The opening tune on A Certain Smile, A Certain Sadness, "I Love You The Way That I Used To Do," gets the pop boots rolling with a catchy melody sure to set your feet tapping. The mix of keyboards and guitar are flawless, creating an overwhelming but not too noisy wall of sound, only for the song to return back to its sing-a-long pop structure.

Indie pop fans live for moments like this.

While the band experiments with droning repetitious analog keyboard segments à la Stereolab, it is the straight ahead tunes such as "Kisses Are Always Promise" which make this album the most delightful listen of an otherwise cold dreary winter musical season.

The opening track on side two, "I'm Lost Without You Here" rivals past Rocketship tunes such as "Hey Hey Girl" and "Your New Boyfriend."

The following track, "Carrie Cooksey" is another standout. If you are willing to venture beyond the pop songs of the Rentals and Veruca Salt, bands such as Rocketship do exist and you will have a tough time finding a more impressive debut album around. A (Mike Burke)

BRIAN WILSON and VAN DYKE PARKS
Orange Crate Art
Warner Bros

In the 30 years since the demise and "unrelease" of the legendary Smile recordings, Brian Wilson and Van Dyke Parks have carned a reputation as the greatest "no shows" in rock 'n' roll history.

Wilson's decline into drugs and psychological disorder put him out of the artistic arenas for most of the '70s and '80s, while Parks returned to his relative obscurity, working on odd solo albums and film scores. Orange Crate Art is something of a renaissance for both men that, while not Smile, is a wonderful testament to the talent and spirit of both performers.

Wilson's name may be first in the title, but the truth is that this is indeed a Van Dykes Parks record. All of the songs, with the exception of George Gershwin's "Lullaby," were written by Parks, Michael Hazelwood or both. The music too, was arranged and produced solely by Parks. Wilson's contributions were strictly vocal, but the incredible power and versatility of those vocals more than earns Wilson top billing.

Thematically, the album is a nostalgic record. The lyrics speak of time long before rock'n'roll — the time of Steinbeck and the time of music sunning itself warmly under the California sun. The songs are almost epic in sweep — a Chinese worker missing his loved ones back home, a bobo afraid of settling down and San Francisco exploding into culture and adventure. Parks wraps all of this in carefully poetic language, painting portraits of a time long ago without regret.

At times the nostalgia may become trying, remembering a moment when "Time was a magazine" or singing of family vacations in Monterey, but for the most part Parks is magical in his ability to create character and mood.

It is Brian Wilson who steals the show, however. Layering vocals on top of vocals, Wilson creates rich palates of sound that explode off the canvas — dynamic and passionate, Wilson's spirit is unbreakable throughout. From a rumbling bass to a soaring falsetto, he sings with pure conviction and joy — recalling, and perhaps surpassing, his glorious Beach Boys vocals. Every song finds Wilson challenging Parks' lush arrangements. Vocals twists and build around the equally complex layers of strings, percussions and keyboards. If the music is too static at times Wilson sweeps it along bring it into sharp focus.

Orange Crate Art is a triumph for both artists. It overcomes its own faults (overly slick productions, trying nostalgia) purely through its spirit and its ability to translate love and time into beautiful melody and musical inventiveness. Let us hope that Orange Create Art signifies the permanent artists return of both Parks and Wilson. A- (Bradley Skaught)

DWIGHT YOAKAM
Gone
Reprise

It is unfortunate that the phrase "new country" too often refers to music that is neither terribly new, nor terribly country. It is even more unfortunate that the few artists who are indeed creating new and original country music are generally ignored by the listening public. There are however a handful of exceptions and at the head of the pack is Dwight Yoakam and his new album, Gone.

Teaming up again with longtime producer, Pete Anderson, Yoakam has added another solid album to a catalogue already filled with boundary breaking, intelligent country music. Anderson's productions, light-years away from the assembly line slickness of Nashville, is full of surprising twists (horns, strings and even a sitar), all recorded with crackling warmth and thoughtfulness.

Songs develop like miniature movies, the sudden entry of "Ring of Fire"-style mariachi horns on "Sorry You

Pullman, Cusack shine in new film

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

MR. WRONG
Directed by Nick Castle with Ellen DeGeneres, Bill Pullman, Joan Cusack
Playing at Hampshire 5Fx

A year or two ago, the comic pairing of Ellen DeGeneres and Bill Pullman would probably not have turned the heads of many studio execs.

At the time she was a stand-up comic whose fledgling sit-com had gone through a name change after just half a season, and was just struggling to get noticed by Nielsen viewers. Graced with nice-guy looks and an even nicer-guy voice, Pullman seemed doomed to a steady career of nice- guy supporting roles.

Things changed dramatically for both performers last year. DeGeneres' eponymous show is an audience favorite, driving most studios into a frenzy to garner her services for her first film. Pullman's turns in Malice, While You Were Sleeping and Casper have given casting agents the confidence in his leading man abilities that earlier box office bombs like Spaceballs and The Serpent and the Rainbow initially damaged.

Scripted by the team of Chris Matheson & Kerry Ehrin & Craig Munson, Mr. Wrong is an ideal showcase for the talents of its two charismatic leads. DeGeneres' Martha Alston is, well... DeGeneres — but who cares? Her superb sense of timing and drier-than-the-Sahara wit are her schtick. Why bother tampering with a tried-and-true formula in a debut effort when the screenplay caters to your strengths? Put simply, it works.

Despite DeGeneres' riotous and often charming performance, Pullman frequently steals scenes from the seasoned comedian. As Whitman Crawford, he revels in the sensitive stud poses of the character, sending up his recent roles in a courageous display of self-mockery. Whether he's pretentiously grumbling his insipid poetry or earnestly cooing a verse of Foreigner's "I Want To Know What Love Is" (a tune which re-appears in one of the film's more hilarious sequences), Pullman is clearly having fun as Whitman, the Martha-obsessed lunatic (and perhaps Pullman alter ego) of the title.

However the collective Achilles' heel of this otherwise fine comedy are the supporting cast members, who seem to have been ill-conceived by the screenwriters in lieu of developing the leads so crafitly. The normally solid Joan Plowright sinks as Whitman's eccentric mother, as do under- used Ellen Cleghorne (as Martha's best buddy) and Dean Stockwell (as a private eye hired by Martha).

Particularly grating is Joan Cusack, whose previous successes in Broadcast News (an Oscar-nominated performance) and Working Girl should trigger something in her head explicitly telling her never to take this sort of painfully unfunny role. Her screeching Elsa, Whitman's sociopathic ex-girlfriend, looks like an extra from a Cyndi Lauper video, but sadly is not as amusing as watching one.

The film's saving grace is the twisted chemistry between DeGeneres and Pullman, who seem to do no wrong in this light romp. B

Theater kicks off spring season with one-man play

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The New WORLD Theater opens its spring season with a one-man play, Assimilation. The solo theater piece, written and performed by Asian-American artist Shishir Kurup, will be presented one night only, Saturday at 8 p.m. at Bowker Auditorium.

Kurup, a past director of the Asian-American Theatre Project, currently co-directs the Raven Group and is a member of the Cornerstone Theater Company.

Kurup's play tells the story of his voyage to California, via Bombay, Kenya and Southern Florida. Kurup, a born storyteller, recounts the story through a series of characterizations framed by engaging first person narrative. He slips personas on and off like soft silk shirts.

In one story, Kurup recalls a Thai mother's reaction to her little girl who is newly naturalized. Eagerly, the little girl asks the judge when she will get her blue eyes. In remembering the incident, the mother said, "that made my tear fall down."

No stranger to diversity and multiculturalism, Kurup was born in Bombay, India, and was raised in Mombasa, Kenya before coming to the United States to study directing and acting at the University of Florida and the University of California at San Diego.

Kurup's dream is to start a film and theater repertory group similar to Kenneth Branagh's company in England or Orson Welles' Mercury Theatre of the '30s and '40s.

"I want to see more things that I like happening on stage and in films," he said. "I was fed up with only being offered roles of the 7-Eleven clerk with a heavy accent and a turban on his head."

This performance is possible in part by a grant from the National endowment for the Arts Presenting and Commissioning Program.

Tickets for Assimilation are $6 for the general public and $5.50 for students and senior citizens. For tickets please call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511 or 1-800-999- UMAS. For more information about New WORLD Theater, please call 545-1972.

Dance company to bring high energy to the FAC

By Lorraine Urbanski
Collegian Correspondent

The Paul Taylor Dance Company would bring their high- energy and provocative show to the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall, in light of their own anniversary — their 38th — tonight at 8 p.m. Their performance will include the pieces entitled Roses, Spindrift and Syzygy.

Celebrating four decades of achievement in dance, Paul Taylor still continues to create more works, which have now exceeded 100, for his 16-dancer company. Tonight's performance will display the artist's work at his best. Roses is set mostly to the orchestral piece associated with the mythical warrior of love, namely Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll." It deals with the theme of romantic love in a celestial manner. "Siegfried Idyll" can be compared to an erotic pulse beating to the dancers' crisp yet flowing movements.

Set to Arnold Schoenberg's "String Quartet Concerto," the next piece, entitled Spindrift (meaning "sea spray"), focuses on a man in solitude amongst his memories of conflict, peace and nature, and is joined with marine mammals, birds, and amphibians by the sea. The animals do things that are very human-like, and this symbolizes how people tend to behave like animals, or beasts, in some cases.

Syzygy, the final piece, takes on a more cosmic approach to dance, offering a philosophical point in relation to one group of dancers to another, with the help of design and composition.

The Paul Taylor Dance Company has enjoyed making special appearances on television. Their first was on the "Dance in America" series in 1978. Since then, they have been on PBS in seven different productions, including the 1993 Emmy Award winning "Paul Taylor's Speaking in Tongues."

Tickets for this performance are $25, $20, $16, and $10 for children age 17 and under. Five College student tickets are $5. For more information or tickets please call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511 or 1-800- 999- UMASS.

Although Cybershop had innumerable products to choose from, most either seemed to be gift ideas or were overpriced. I would rather go to super stores like Lechmere or Linens 'N' Things rather then paying these inflated prices. Cybershop was also heavy on the home goods and light on electronics. In short, it is really for baby boomers and families rather then college students.

Compact Discs and Videos

Obvious items people would expect to buy on-line are CDs and videos. There are thousands of places to go for such needs.

One place I visited while browsing was Video Online Express at http://vox.VideoExpress.com or Telnet vox.VideoExpress.com. Like Cybershop, Video Express is an exclusively on-line retailer specializing in videos on formats ranging from VHS to Laser Disc and video games.

Video Express claims to offer over 48,000 videos and 140 video games. As they claimed, there prices were reasonable. Their collection of videos were quite extensive, so if you are looking for something extremely obscure they'll probably have it. However, their collection of video games are limited to the Sega Genesis and Game Gear, and the Super Nintendo and Nintendo Game Boy.

The page was extremely basic. It completely lacked any graphics whatsoever. However, it used forms searches which are quite easy. Results come up with titles, prices and a link with more information about the item.

These are just a few of the places you can go if you are looking to go on-line shopping. There are over a 1000 Web sites dedicated to selling products. Whatever you are looking for, it is probably available on-line.

recordings all at discounted prices, but it is hurting the local area more than helping. Because of their enormous buying power they can afford to sell items at a discounted rate but this directly hurts every local record and book store in the area. Buy a CD at Media Play and the money goes off to some exsperate head who spends his day playing golf while supporting a local store could help feed the store owner.

Local businesses are an essential part of a small town community. Walk into a store like Main Street Records and you will receive respect and be treated by a caring attendant who knows the difference between Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan and Chaka Khan. This can not be said about Media Play.

In high school, malls were not all that bad but then any place where you were without parental supervision was all right in my eyes.

Before I discovered there was more to the music world than Def Leppard and Michael Jackson, the mall record store was my favorite spot. It was the one haven amidst a burning hell. Then I realized that $16.99 was a bit pricey for a CD and that my mother knew more about the music scene than your average Record Town employee.

If you asked them in 1992 "Do you have the new Pixies album" they would probably respond "Sorry but we could order it for you. It will take seven weeks and cost $20. I do recommend this album here by this hot new band Milli Vanilli." Gee, thanks! You should be writing record reviews for the Collegian. Now I just walk past your average record store and laugh at the displays showcasing their CDs on sale for $13.99.

Have you ever noticed how rude people are at the mall? Try finding a parking space at a large mall in December and you will be lucky if you don't get beat up. By the time you are done you will deserve a handicap plate. Respect is an unknown word as soon as you enter through that door under the Mall Entrance sign.

Back home there are two malls within close driving distance (i.e. less than 15 minutes — anything more is too long.) One is white trash central, where the girls look as if they just got off the set of a Skid Row video, while the other is fancy enough that it would even impress Kelly from "Beverly Hills 90210" while she was on one of her drug- induced spending sprees. The mall is covered in gold trim. Chandeliers hang from the ceiling. I feel rich for a second until security guards begin following me. This is snob central, complete with valet parking, just in case your legs are tired after a strenuous day at the mall.

No matter how much I whine about the mall my friends still insist to drag me, only because they need transportation. Once there we agree to meet at the book store at a certain time and then I rush to read the newest magazines. Hours and hours of my life have been spent at Lauriat's and Barnes & Nobles — they are the saving grace of malls. The employees must hate customers like myself who read and read for hours but never buy a thing. I can't remember the last time I bought something at a mall bookstore but I swear that I have at least glanced through every section from psychology to photography.

Next time you are at the mall stop by the book store and you will probably see me reading a book on Clara Barton or Spanish-American dictators. Sound boring too you? Now you know how it feels for me to drudge through the mall.

Soraya creates acoustic pop with universal feeling

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

When you listen to Soraya sing, you can't help but be impressed by the way her style of music blends so beautifully with that of the person she's been touring with for the past two and a half weeks.

Maybe it's her dreamy melodies, mandolin littered tunes or what she calls "acoustic pop," but Soraya compliments Natalie Merchant perfectly.

Born in Colombia and raised both there and in New Jersey, Soraya's music career began at Julliard where she was a member of a junior program.

"I play anything with strings basically. I excel with the guitar and the violin," she said.

According to Soraya, she had classical training and ambitions to be in an orchestra until she discovered literature, poetry and writing in high school.

"I discovered literature and poetry in high school and I just started writing lyrics. And it's kind of hard to sing a song to a violin," she said smiling. "Through high school and definately through college my aspirations changed."

Lyrically, the musician writes songs that are both thought out and impulsive.

"It all depends, sometimes, like the single — well I just sat down and it came out. I did not sit down with any intentions to write it. But other times I do have to create an image or a word. I like it when I can internalize a thought or emotion and universalize it as it comes out."

"I discovered literature and poetry in high school and I just started writing lyrics."
–Soraya

Soraya has great admiration for singer Sarah McLaughlin. She also greatly admires Virginia Woolf and picked both as the two people she'd most likely want to have dinner with.

In five years Soraya wants to, "hopefully be a more evolved singer and possibly a producer." Right now she's content with touring and promoting her album. Her video is currently running on MTV Latino and will soon air on VH1.

The one thing that Soraya is sure of is "to respect what I've been given." Despite possible future plans for a family she made it clear that singing and songwriting will, "always be a part of my life. If I didn't do those things I wouldn't be able to give all of myself to a family."

Mullins Center taken by dancing Merchant

NATALIE MERCHANT
Mullins Center
Feb. 21

The packed Mullins Center roared as the shadows of Natalie Merchant dancing were seen on a large black curtain as her band began "San Andres Fault." It was the first of many magical moments where Merchant would dance to her own beat while her band jammed.

Dressed in a cute pale green summer dress and clunky black shoes, Merchant, ex-lead singer of the acclaimed 10,000 Maniacs, led her six piece band through over an hour of crowd pleasing hits. Most of the songs were taken from her platinum selling solo album Tigerlily but for old times sake three 10,000 Maniac songs were thrown in, each time bringing the crowd to their feet.

The first half of her set was subdued with versions of "Where I Go" and "River" both songs off her solo album. During "River" Merchant spent half the time on her knees passionately singing.

Her top 40 smash "Carnival" brought the crowd to their feet as they swayed along to Merchant's stunning voice. During the extended guitar solo Merchant took the opportunity to showcase her fine dancing skills as she twisted and bopped to the music.

The highlight of the show was a moving version of the 10,000 Maniac's classic "These Are Days" from Our Time In Eden. Merchant began the set dancing on a high platform behind the drum as her shadow was projected onto a white curtain. She swayed in the limelight with much grace and poise only to get down to sing the opening lines along with the rest of the crowd. During an intense percussion solo Merchant retook center stage proving why she is the true dancing queen.

From here the band performed on cruise control, never recapturing the brilliance of "These Are Days" but stayed on course for an excellent show.

Near the end of the regular set, the band's performance of "I May Know The Word" went on and on and on, the guitar solo alone clocked in at well over five minutes. This and the anti-climatic finale "Seven Years" proved to be the only low points of an otherwise entertaining evening.

For an encore the stage was illuminated with massive strobe lights as Merchant took the dancing stage again. The four song encore was highlighted by an attempted version of the 10,000 Maniac song "Noah's Dove," the first time her band ever played the song.

Hampden to feature play by solo artist

Recently completing a year long tour with the Gay Sweatshop in London, England with a production of In Your Face, New York based poet, actress and solo performer Pamela Sneed will bring her one women show Barricade Against the Wind to the University of Massachusetts this evening.

Sneed is making a bold statement and transcending societal boundaries with her work. Her art is a mixture of poetry and humor, theater and identity. She uses her life experiences, especially if they revolve around her being a black lesbian, as the foundation for her art.

In Barricade Against the Wind she chronicles the exit into lesbian love and the separation from her father. The character, who was adopted, finds sanctuary with her father after her parents divorced.

This work is the third solo act she has written. Her previous show Mayla Berry centered on three black heroines: A blues singer, a lesbian recluse and a 13-year-old girl. Sneed has also given many poetry performances, been involved in theater and has made appearances in both television and film.

Her debut show Imagine Being More Afraid of Freedom than Slavery received critical acclaim for its uniqueness and sincerity. It combined a blend of history and autobiographical work to create a moving odyssey about slavery and addiction. Sneed also used elements of Harriet Tubman's life as an inspiration.

Sneed hopes that her shows will serve as an inspiration to others as Harriet Tubman did for her. Imagine's main character struggles with such hardships as drugs, religion and relationships, as well as experiencing the isolation of being gay.

In addition to winning numerous awards for her work, Sneed has also been featured in many publications and anthologies. She also held a five year position as director of an alternative school program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual youth at the Hetrick-Martin Institute. She is currently an artistic consultant to a plethora of youth organizations.

Pamela Sneed will perform at the Hamden Theater tonight at 7:30 p.m. Admission is $3-$5 based on a sliding scale.

You know Bobby, copying these answers from our family encyclopedia for your science project reminds me of my college days. Asked?," the rumbling percussions and smooth R&B guitar on "Nothing" all rise and fall in perfect synch with Yoakam's tales of heartbreak and sadness.

At the heart of the album, however, is the two punch knock out combination of Anderson's guitar and Yoakam's voice. Anderson's playing is some of the most inspired and original in all of music — slipping from a melodic flash of James Burton lyricism one minute, to the suggestive minimalism of Luther Perkins the next. His tasteful and lyrical playing winds its way around the entire album, consistent and powerful. Vocally, Yoakam is as solid as ever. His Buck Owens holler is as intact as his Merle Haggard growl, and he soars beautifully, adding layers of meaning to his deceptively simple lyrics. Embodying his characters with just the right amounts of pathos and country rocker defiance.

If there is a weakness on the album, it is in the lyrics. Too repetitive thematically, the lyrics fail to continuously challenge, too often trodden already well trod ground. At their best, however, they are as insightful and telling as any Yoakam has penned. Yoakam soars, Anderson explodes and the production tears off in a direction you never saw coming, taking you right along with it. B (B.S.)

THE MERMEN
A Glorious Lethal Euphoria
Mesa/Bluemoon

With the success of Quentin Tarantino's Pulp Fiction soundtrack, surf guitar music has taken a major resurgence in popularity. The Mermen, hailing form San Francisco, are a new power trio who recently put out this mind-numbing album of surf instrumentals. It was named by Guitar magazine as one of the top 10 guitar albums of 1995. Their sound fuses together the likeness of surf guitar guru Dick Dale, the feedback meanderings of Sonic Youth and the chord voicings and soul of Neil Young. This is an incredibly interesting combination, and the result is equal parts intriguing and brilliant.

Some of the songs on this offering are heartfelt pieces that could be put to love scenes in the surf classic Endless Summer. A few could be easily played over car chases or crime scenes aftermaths in slasher flicks. Others are so cerebrally sonic that one can imagine J Mascis, Glenn Danzig and Trent Reznor huddled in a corner biting their fingernails and shivering while listening to it.

The last track on it is a spicy treat in itself, as the drummer drops out as guitarist Jim Thomas and bassists Allen Whitman pull out a spooky reworking of Brahms' Third Symphony.

Glorious Lethal Euphoria is one of the most powerful instrumental rock album's this reviewer has purchased. A- (Derek Oleson)

R&B artist Faith Evans takes stage in concert for UPC tonight

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

The Student Union Ballroom will be grooving to the sounds of "the hottest, Hip-Hop/R&B artist in the music world today" as Faith Evans takes the stage in support of her platinum album, Faith. Her debut album has created a storm in the music world with massive critical praise as both a songwriting and an arranger. Not bad for a 21-year old.

Since the age of two, Evans has been turning heads with her remarkable voice. Beginning in church choirs the star singer has risen through the ranks of background vocalist all the way to become a full fledged solo artist.

Before the release of Faith, Evans worked extensively with Mary J. Blige, co-writing four songs off Blige's album, My Life. She has also worked with Pebbles, Color Me Badd and Al B. Sure! among others.

Sean "Puffy" Combs, President/CEO of Bad Boy Entertainment Label, found Evans and was immediately enthralled.

"When I listen to Faith sing I think of rain, it sparks so many emotions ...," he remarked. "There's so many aspects to rain."

Evans' debut single, "You Used To Love Me" stormed the charts reaching gold status and her new hit, "Soon As I Get Home" is following a similar success pattern. She was also featured on the acclaimed Waiting To Exhale soundtrack.

Evans has always been her harshest critic, saying "I think sometimes I'm too critical and analytical when it comes to my music — I always strive for that perfection." For many she has already reached her goal.

Opening up the University Production & Concerts sponsored event is Smoothe Da Hustler, an upcoming hard- core Hip-Hop act. His hot new single, "Broken Language," is a collaboration with his brother Trigga who recently signed to Def Jam.

Faith Evans appears at the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 7:30 p.m. with Smoothe Da Hustler. Tickets are $14 in advance for UMass students; $15 for UMass students at the door; $17 for non-UMass students.

the price. Say a guy needs to buy a card and goes to CVS. Well, Mr. One-stop–shopping realizes that, hey — they're also groceries to be had at CVS — so why not buy some food there instead of going to Stop & Shop later on?

Why? Well, for one thing CVS is going to charge an arm and a leg for those groceries and chances are they could have been had at least a third of the price. This type of mentality is another reason why cosmetic counters love guys around major holidays. Not only do they procrastinate until the last minute, but they also are in such a hurry to leave that they will pay anything to get the hell out of there.

Natural Selection

Men are not selective when they shop and they don't take time out for details — in fact they only take time out for a pucky runs.

Malls scare men because they offer more than one choice. They scare men because they consume time and a require time commitment. They see women there with their friends sharing and bonding like only women can and that frightens them. It makes them fear that they too will have to bond and share and God forbid — express their feelings. They see malls as one big shrink's office where they will be torn open and left to bleed.

Is it true or do men shy away from malls? Men shy away from malls because it isn't masculine to shop for more than half a minute for an item and no man will admit that he likes going to the mall with his girlfriend. That's like saying he likes to wear pink tutus around the house every morning when he dusts the plants. It just isn't done.

When you're in junior high malls were where you went trolling for um, "chicks." It's a place where you stood with your other pre-pubescent friends to see who was with who. But as you get older and (hopefully) outgrow the meat market stage, malls become some evil place — a place to be feared.

Safety in Numbers

According to my friend Chris S., shopping, especially for those of the opposite sex, involves team players. They have to take a male friend with them to the mall as a sort of emotional support — like AA members.

That way when they go into the mall (synchronizing watches for maximal plan and out time) if they don't feel quite as alone when they ask for that bottle of perfume or article of clothing. Chris S. has even gone so far as to confide in me that men really can't comparative shop — it's just too confusing.

For instance the time he went to get perfume for his mother. When asked what size of perfume and whether or not he wanted eau de toilette, perfume, spray, mist, body powder etc. he blanked. Even his trusty side kick blanked and so he ended up being coerced into buying a gift basket. But even though he spent far more than he probably should have he was happy because a) the ordeal was over in under 15 minutes (a record low) and b) Christmas shopping was done until next year.

Why this phobia? This lack of confidence? This need to have a cheerleader when you ask for that bottle of Beautiful? One may never know, but I think it has a lot to do with the fact that men are intimidated by sales people.

Sales people phobia

Men suffer from sales people phobia because they haven't learned to deal with them. They do not realize that these sales people need them to buy stuff so they will get paid. It's called commission, guys.

Except they don't see it that way — the sales person is like their date's father. They ask too many questions, expect quick answers and know how to stare really, really well. Again, guys panic. They begin to feel awkward, inept and totally out of control of the situation. Their palms sweat, their hearts race and they mumble responses. You know maybe if they spent more time in a mall they would learn to deal with sales people. But tick tock, Alice — you're three minutes is up and it's out the door with whatever you can find that will keep those scary sales people away.

Let's not even mention returning things — thank God for mothers. My friend Mike said that he hates returning things so much that he'd rather hold on to an ugly $20 sweater than go through the hassle of returning it. That's $20 he's squandering away due to some hidden insecurity.

The Whiner Syndrome

If a man is at the mall for more than say, half an hour he develops "whiners syndrome," a medical condition known to all woman. Sure signs of this are frequent sighing, rolling of eyes, dragging of feet, anguished moans and the inevitable — "Are we done yet?"

Remind you of anything? Remembering riding in the back seat of a car on a road trip with your parents when you were five? Yes, immaturity certainly is the end result and males have learned that whining works magic.

However, if pushed too far they explode, cause a big scene and utter embarrassment. Maybe they should have a special play room for guys at the mall where you can take them. I always make sure that many of the stores I want to shop in are near stores guys can go to. Electronic stores, game stores, book stores, gadget stores and of course anything with power tools.

Records stores were a sure way to get another old beau of mine to the mall. Waving the promise of a new CD in his face and he'd roll over. Promise to pay for it and you could enter him into Letterman's stupid pet tricks. I think it's pretty sad that you have to bribe your one and only to spend quality time with you, and mall time is quality time.

Mental Block

It all narrows down to a mental block that men have against the mall. A block constructed by pre–conceived notions and an inability to explore the unknown world of shopping or valuable time. For some reason "let's go to the mall" has become the equivalency of "let's get a vasectomy." The word "sale" is synonymous with kryptonite to Superman.

There should be support groups for these poor lost souls and maybe one day, if they try really hard, the word mall will no longer cause one to break out into a sweat, but rather ineite excitement at an invitation to a whole new world.

season opener in Texas. The early scouting report is in — the Owls are ranked No. 25 in the nation and are already 7–1.

Freshman center fielder Bubba Graham leads Rice with a .448 batting average.

• Surely you must have seen how Georgetown tossed Connecticut around on Monday in men's basketball action. This reassured what we knew all along: UConn's frontcourt could never match up with UMass'.

• If you see women's basketball center Melissa Gurile (Feb. 20) or Media Relations Director Bill Strickland (Feb. 23) on campus, wish them a belated/happy birthday.

• Men's gymnastics coach Roy Johnson seems to think I need a crash course in gymnastics etiquette. He helped me learn it pretty fast when his team set a season–high point total on Tuesday with 221.150 against Southern Connecticut. Men's gym is now 8–2 on the season.

• The vans left on Tuesday, as the men's swimming team headed to Buffalo, NY for the Atlantic 10 Championships that start today and extend into Saturday. Coach Russ Yarworth's team is the other undefeated team (8–0) on campus, and following a season of tragedy and overcoming the odds, this is a team to root for.

• Tom Schaefer, Thomas Holden, Todd Fowler, Eric McCormack, Leah Muliero, Katie Keane and Heather Olsen of the UMass ski team have all qualified for the NCAA Regional to be held Feb. 23–24 at Middlebury, Vt.

• From what coach David Kuzara said, it sounded like a pretty awesome atmosphere down in Alabama when his team visited the top–ranked Crimson Tide this past week.

Over 7,000 people came out to see the Minutewomen, who scored 191.400 in a losing effort. Your first chance to get a close–up look at UMass comes this Monday when the team has its home–opener against Eastern Michigan (7 p.m.).

• Three athletes from nearby Longmeadow, Mass. who have made a huge impact on the UMass sports scene this year: men's soccer defender Brad Miller, women's soccer forward Rachel LeDue, and women's swimming sprint freestyler Sarah Baker.

• Women's lacrosse is sure to have a tough defense this upcoming season, as juniors Michelle Warrington, Erica Bryan and Kristen Hocker all return. All three attended Ridley High School together in Pennsylvania.

UMass opens its season March 14 against Harvard.

• Ken O'Brien's men's track team finished its season at 10–7 with a third place standing at the A–10 Championships this season, the team's highest finish ever.

• Adding to our list of those people heavily impacted by the rise of the men's basketball team: secretary Bonnie Martin. Bonnie has probably had to answer more phone calls than the campus operator. Keep up the good work, Bonnie.

• Men's lacrosse was scheduled to scrimmage Springfield yesterday, as both teams hoped to get some work in outdoors. It will officially be spring when the names Dennis Kelly, Eric Bailey and Co. start appearing in this scribe.

• The upcoming weekend schedule here at UMass is fairly light, with the men's hoop team hosting George Washington on Saturday at the Mullins Center (noon), and the hockey team entertaining Providence that night (8 p.m.). That means a long day of work for the people at Mullins, who will have to change the basketball surface to ice in what is truly a remarkable process to watch.

meets that we weren't before because our diving was weak.

"I'm going to miss them all. I can't believe that four years have gone by for these guys. It seems like they were just kids and all of a sudden they are seniors and graduating."

With the tragic death of Greg Menton previously this season, the Minutemen have an added incentive to win this meet other than for themselves. Yarworth is certain that Menton will be in the minds of all of the Minutemen swimmers, an inspiration that will make the difference between winning the championship and being runner–up.

"They want to do well, and they want to be able to call his parents and tell them they won it for Mento," Yarworth said. "They want to know it in their hearts that they won it for Greg. That's a kind of inspiration that I don't think can be downplayed."

With the eventful year that it has been for the swim team, Yarworth hopes that his team can take the motivation and inspiration that has resulted and turn it into a championship. In Yarworth's eyes, the key to the meet will be intensity from the outset.

"We've got to go straight from the start," he said. "When the meet starts you have got to go, there is no holding back. It's going to be nip–and–tuck the whole way, so you have to be ready from the beginning."

When asked for his pick to win, Yarworth was certain in his response.

"UMass, no doubt about it."

With the cast of swimmers he has and the various talents they all bring to the team, it is hard to have doubt in Yarworth's response, a response that only time will answer.

"At BC, I was just an average kid coming out of high school. The difference from then to now... I totally have to give all the credit to coach Mallen."

So with his final regular season contest less than two weeks away, Manganaro will finish his collegiate career proudly.

"The amount of pride I have right now is unmeasurable," he said. "I'm going to be the first person in my family to graduate from college. I'm proud of what I've done on the ice and the person I've turned out to be."

Manganaro hopes his career isn't over yet.

"I honestly have to play somewhere next year, because I'm not ready to walk away from the game. I live for this game," he said. "If I didn't have practice to come to everyday, I don't know what I'd do. Hockey has been a part of my life since I was two years old. Giving it up or ending my career now is just unthinkable. It means a great deal to me."

Women's pro league to begin this fall

By Christine Hanley
Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — Backed by $4 million in private funding and a boyish enthusiasm for women's basketball, Steve Hams said Wednesday that his new women's professional league will begin this fall.

Hams, head of a group of six people who have invested in the American Basketball League, said the timing couldn't be better, citing the rise in popularity of the sport and this year's Olympics.

"We're dedicated to doing this right after the Olympics," Hams said, adding that there will be eight teams in the league. The Eastern Conference will be comprised of a Hartford-Springfield team, Atlanta, Columbus, Ohio, and Richmond, Va. Members of the Western Conference will be in Denver, Portland, Ore., San Jose, Calif., and Seattle.

The league, headquartered in San Jose, has signed 35 players, including 10 of 11 from the U.S. National Team. Former Connecticut star Rebecca Lobo, the most popular player in the game, has yet to sign.

Hams said the league has made its interest clear to Lobo, although no formal offer has been made to last year's college player of the year. He knows Lobo's participation would be a factor in the league's immediate success.

"There's a standing invitation," Hams said. "We'd love her to play. Having her play here would be a tremendous plus.

"On the other hand, we're not going to revolve our league around one player. There are a lot of good players out there, and the exposure they're going to get during the Olympics is going to increase their popularity."

The league plans to play a 40-game season from October to February. Players will be paid an average of $70,000, with a minimum of $40,000 and a high of $125,000. Tickets will cost about $10.

Two premiere players will be assigned to each team based on their regional popularity and an effort to ensure parity. The remaining eight players on each roster will be selected in the inaugural ABL draft in June. The league plans to hold open tryouts May 17-20 in Atlanta to round out the pool of players.

Hams, a former business executive, said the league is talking with major sponsors and national television networks about possible contracts.

Hams is positive about the prospects of his league despite suggestions that several other women's basketball leagues have failed in the past, and that CBA teams do poorly at the turnstiles. He visited all the founding cities of the new league, and is convinced the teams will be able to survive as viable and entertaining enterprises.

Wake Forest drills Clemson

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. — Steve Goolsby and Tony Rutland fueled a second-half run that helped No. 10 Wake Forest remain perfect at home this season with a 68-48 victory over Clemson on Wednesday night.

Goolsby scored all 14 of his points in the second half, including eight in a 22-2 run that helped the Demon Deacons (18-4, 10-3 Atlantic Coast Conference) extend their school record of consecutive home victories to 18.

Rutland had five of his 12 points in the surge as Wake Forest guaranteed that for the sixth year in a row, Clemson (15-8, 5-8) will not have a winning record in the ACC.

The game matched the only team in the ACC without a home loss in conference play against the only one without a road victory. Nonetheless, Clemson kept it close until going 8:13 without a field goal in the second half.

Rusty LaRue had 16 points and Tim Duncan added 12 points, seven rebounds and three blocks for the Demon Deacons, who were 10-of-16 from 3-point range. Wake Forest defeated the Tigers for the sixth consecutive time at home and avenged last month's 55-41 loss in Clemson, the Demon Deacons' lowest point total in 15 years. Freshman forward Tony Christie led Clemson with a season-high 15 points.

After Wake Forest scored the first nine points and Clemson rallied to tie it at 11, neither team led by more than six until midway through the second half.

Rutland hit a 3-pointer to break a 41-41 tie, and on Clemson's next possession, the Tigers' Greg Buckner was called for pushing Rutland. Buckner objected and was assessed a technical.

Rutland made two of three free throws. Wake Forest inbounded the ball and worked it to Goolsby, who hit a 3-pointer to make it 49-41.

By the time the run ended, the Tigers had missed seven consecutive shots and turned it over twice, and Wake Forest had stretched its lead to 63-43 with 3:30 remaining.

Clemson also got 10 points apiece from Tom Wideman and Terrell McIntyre.

Orlando keeping record in perspective

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. — The NBA's oldest record didn't stand a chance.

Not with the Orlando Magic determined to take care of business and the Philadelphia 76ers offering token resistance.

Four minutes into their quest for the league mark for consecutive home wins at the start of a season, it was apparent the Magic would succeed Tuesday night.

Philadelphia owns the NBA's worst record, while Orlando has been the league's most successful team at home the past two years. No starter played more than 30 minutes, and the final score was as close as it was — 123-104 — only because the 76ers outscored the Magic's reserves 44-33 in the fourth quarter.

"No disrespect to Philadelphia, but I don't think I've ever been involved in a record-setting game that was easier than this," All-Star point guard Anfernee Hardaway said. "We jumped on them early and never let up."

The Magic improved to 28-0 at Orlando Arena for the best home start in league history. The Red Auerbach-coached Washington Capitols began the 1946-47 season with 27 straight victories on their home court.

The next streak Orlando will take aim at is the NBA's overall mark for consecutive home wins.

The Boston Celtics won 38 straight from December 1985 to November 1986. Orlando has won 35 in a row dating back to last season when it won its last seven home games to finish a league-best 39-2.

The crowd of 17,248 stood and cheered Tuesday night's accomplishment, but the players didn't celebrate. The Magic is only 10-14 outside Orlando Arena, and a three-game road trip that includes stops at Indiana, Milwaukee and Chicago began Wednesday night.

"To be honest, this is great and everything, but our focus is on winning the championship and winning on the road," forward Horace Grant said. "Until you've proven you can win on the road against quality teams like that, you haven't done anything." The Magic broke a four-game road losing streak at Miami last weekend and improved to 4-0 since the All-Star break with Tuesday night's win. The team's average margin of victory in three home dates since the break is more than 25 points.

Dennis Scott, who made six 3-pointers and scored 20 first-half points against Philadelphia, said the club returned with a commitment to be the league's best team between now and the end of the season.

"The attitude we basically are taking the second half of the season is just take care of business," he said. "We don't care who scores or whatever. Let's just get as many wins as possible."

The Magic has grown tired of questions about why the team plays so well at home, yet is so inconsistent on the road. They know the swing through Indiana, Milwaukee and Indiana could set the tone for the rest of the season.

"We're not knocking the streak," Hardaway said. "We're proud of ourselves for breaking the record. But if we can go on the road and win all three of these games, that would be larger than the record at this point."

the collegiate ranks have stolen the spotlight from many players whose play would earn them the shot to try-out for the Olympic team.

Brian Evans of Indiana has quietly worked his way into contention for the Big 10 scoring title. Brevin Knight of Stanford is one of the top five point guards in the nation. Jess Settles of Iowa has been a Big 10 force all season, keeping the Hawkeyes' tourney hopes alive. Erick Dampier has guided Mississippi State back into the Top 25. Ace Custis led Virginia Tech to its first Top 10 ranking. Any one of these players could crack the lineup.

Take into consideration Jeff Capel of Duke, Drew Barry of Georgia Tech and Harold Deane of Virginia out of the ACC. Othella Harrington from Georgetown, Chauncey Billups of Colorado, Shareef Abdur-Rahim out of California and Tony Delk from Kentucky also would stand a chance.

What about the players you never hear about? Steve Nash of Santa Clara, Malik Rose of Drexel, Shea Seals of Tulsa, etc.

Another point to consider: should high school blue– chippers, such as Kobe Bryant from Wynnewood, Penn., be given a shot?

With all these outstanding players, the United States would be assured a strong team. Now, who would coach...?

• Five Michigan players and a recruit were involved in a car accident last weekend, and although none were seriously injured, a broken arm has ended Robert Traylor's season.

Maurice Taylor, Traylor, Louis Bullock, Willie Mitchell, and Ron Oliver were all in the car that Taylor was driving. Also involved in the accident was Mateen Cleaves, a recruit from Flint, Mich.

The players may have violated an NCAA rule which states that entertainment can be provided to recruits as long as the entertainment is within a 30–mile radius of campus. The party that the players were returning from was just outside of that radius.

The car Taylor was driving was a 1996 Ford Explorer Limited Edition, which reportedly belongs to his grandmother. The list price for the Explorer is over $36,000.

• Maryland guard Duane Simpkins has been suspended for three games for a NCAA rules infraction. Simpkins accepted a $2,000 loan from his former AAU coach, Donnie Gross.

The acceptance of the loan was a violation of NCAA guidelines because the relationship between Simpkins and Gross is based on athletic ability and not friendship. Rules state that there can be no preferential treatment for athletes.

Simpkins said he needed the loan to pay off campus parking tickets totaling $8,242 dollars. The amount, which has accumulated over the course of a few years, includes infractions such as a $15 expired parking meter tickets and a $500 ticket for illegal use of a state–issued disabled permit.

• The three players involved in this week's Wyoming– UTEP fight have been issued additional suspensions. Sly Johnson of Wyoming has been suspended indefinitely, while Jeff Spillar and Kevin Beal of UTEP face additional two–game suspensions.

• Randy Livingston of Louisiana State has left school in order to rehab his knee. Livingston tore the anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee in 1993, which was followed by reconstructive surgery. Last season he broke his right kneecap, and had to have three surgeries, the most recent of which was last September.

Livingston has announced he plans to re–enroll at LSU in the fall.

3. Washington Bullets— Grade B. Strengths: Youth, promise and a diverse lineup. Weaknesses: Youth, promise and a diverse lineup. The Bullets, even at 23–28, are definitely a pleasant surprise. The rise of Brent Price has made Calbert Cheaney expendable, while Gheorge Muresan is playing like George Mikan, well— he's getting there. Washington is headed in the right direction, with or without Chris Webber— let's just hope it doesn't take five more 50–seasons.

4. Miami Heat— Grade C. Strengths: Pat Riley, guts, nothing to lose. Weaknesses: injury–prone, paper–thin confidence, lack of talent. Confidence level is disappointing, especially for a Riley–led team. Trading for Alonzo Mourning was an obvious plus, except that injuries have plagued early–season momentum. Even General Rilcy will need at least two years to get the Heat burning. See you in the lottery fellas...

5. New Jersey Nets— Grade B. Strengths: Solid, talented frontcourt. Michael Rowe, attitude adjustment. Weaknesses: GM Willis Reed, public perception. Finally, the Nets have some stability in their organization. Rowe has been a breath of fresh air as he wasted no time dumping Derrick Coleman and discarding Kenny Anderson. P.J. Brown is a stud in the making and the "new" Nets are playing like they actually care. Their recent winning streak just might be enough to sneak them into the eighth and final playoff slot. What? The Nets in the playoffs— was that written here?

6. Boston Celtics— Grade D. Strengths: Well, they used to be good. really they were. Weaknesses: Little talent and no direction. My mother always told me if there isn't anything nice to say, don't say anything at all.

7. Philadelphia 76ers— Grade F. Strengths. Is there one? Weaknesses: Oh, where does one begin. Except for rookie Jerry Stackhouse, the 76ers could be Philadelphia's highest paid halfway house. Did you know even Chris Ford turned down this coaching job. Jerry, you didn't sign a long–term deal, did you?

Central Division

1. Chicago Bulls— Grade A+. Strengths: Priceless cohesiveness, the belief they are the best, coach Phil Jackson. Weaknesses: Even at 46–5 there are minute flaws. Lack of a true center will hurt during the playoffs and the threat of injury to the core is potentially lethal. Jackson is intuitive enough not to let a possible 70–win season get in the way of the ultimate goal. The only conceivable obstacle ahead is Orlando in the Eastern Conference Finals.

2. Indiana Pacers— Grade B+. Strengths: Mental toughness, tenacity. Weaknesses: Reggie Miller's free agency, reality. Still a tough playoff team but questions about Miller's status will hinder playoff focus.

3. Cleveland Cavaliers— Grade A. Strengths: head coach Mike Fratello, Terrell Brandon. Weaknesses: Streaky, lack of scoring ability. Once again, despite injuries, the "czar of the telestrator" has found a way. After starting slow, there is no question this team has played up to the maximum of its ability. Unfortunately, the ability still has to face the Bulls, Magic, Knicks and Pacers.

4. Atlanta Hawks— Grade B. Strengths: coach Lenny Wilkens deserves an A himself for getting players like Steve Smith and Mookie Blaylock to understand their roles. Too bad they have to wear those hideous uniforms.

5. Detroit Pistons— Grade B+. Strengths: a solid nucleus of players that want to win. Weaknesses: lack of veteran presence in the paint. As Detroit continues to steadily climb the ladder of success, smiles are slowly returning to fans in Motown. As long as coach Doug Collins properly distributes his emotion, the sky's the limit for Lou Roe & Co.

6. Charlotte Hornets— Grade C. Strengths: Kenny Anderson, Glen Rice. Weaknesses: acceptance of mediocrity. Phenomenal acquisition in Anderson but they desperately miss the services of Mourning. Is this the end of the road for Allan Bristow?

7. Milwaukee Bucks— Grade C– Strengths front–line. Weaknesses: Inability to take the next step, perimeter defense. This was supposed to be the year Milwaukee made that playoff push. Well... maybe next year. Shawn Respert has been disappointing and the early–season acquisition of Benoit Benjamin simply lacked purpose. Where is the "always dangerous" Jack Sikma when you need him?

8. Toronto Raptors— Grade C–. Strengths: VP Isiah Thomas, rookie Damon Stoudamire, fan support. Weaknesses: the reality of expansion. When Toronto natives booed Thomas for selecting Stoudamire, it didn't bother Damon. Now, Stoudamire's play has long silenced the critics. With the right blueprint in place, the Raptors appear to be headed in the right direction.

Where are they now?
1) Bob Thornton
2) Mark McNamara
3) Scott Wedman
4) Paul Mokeski
5) Randy Breuer

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — An "A-1" day for study and research. Intellectual pursuits are favored over physical feats. You will have no trouble getting someone's approval to enroll in a special course. Put romance on hold for now.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — Your helpful input or career assistance will promote better understanding. Someone you meet in a business setting could be your ideal romantic match.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Although security has its attractions, you should not allow yourself to get stuck in a rut. Making a big change in business will not be easy; seek expert advice to reduce the possibility of error.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Buying a condo could be a wise investment. Friends will be supportive if your plans are realistic. Seize the initiative in career matters. Your intuition is your best guide when making long-range decisions.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Do not fly off the handle over a misunderstanding. A tactful response will help restore domestic harmony. Finish a major project without further ado.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Break new grounds with your writing skills or musical talent. Something you launch now will create a ripple effect. Logic only goes so far where romance is concerned. Shower that special someone with TLC.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Powerful ideas sweep your career along on a sea of bright promise. Your opinions carry weight and may provide the glue that holds a business deal together.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) —Your helpful input or career assistance will promote better understanding. Someone you meet in a business setting could be your ideal romantic match.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — A confidential deal will increase your resources substantially. Keep outsiders in the dark. It may be better to bypass a so-called "bargain" when shopping.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — A splendid day lies ahead. You are at your best! Money is available for loans. Take extra steps to protect your valuables. Loved ones prove surprisingly cooperative when asked for a favor. Show appreciation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — Tend to banking arrangements without further delay. You will be very busy during the next few days. You could be asked to account for joint funds. Keep careful records. Receipts will prove your case.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Wield your authority judiciously and you will earn respect. Work under a cloak of secrecy. Playing the role of confidential advisor will pay off handsomely. Make certain you are in a position to help.

Intensity drives UMass' Manganaro to be the best

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

With the Minutemen trailing New Hampshire 5-2 on the road, the game was starting to slip away. A combination of bad breaks and bounces coupled with some questionable calls by the officials had left the Massachusetts hockey team in a hole.

Trying to get his team back into the game, Sal Manganaro raced toward the offensive zone. As he crossed the blue line, he wound up to shoot. Midway through his wind up, the whistle blew. Manganaro fired wide to avoid hitting the goalie.

The referee, Steve McBride, pointed to Manganaro and penalized him for shooting the puck after the play was dead.

Manganaro was furious and he let McBride know it. McBride added a 10 minute misconduct to the two minutes he already had. With only six minutes remaining in the game, Manganaro went to the locker room.

As the UNH fans taunted him as he left the ice, Manganaro raised his hands in defiance and flung his stick down the runway.

"I get very intense and very involved in what I'm doing," he said "That's what drives me to be the type of player I am. I play better when I'm emotional... when I'm excited or angry. That's just the way I am.

"At UNH, I was playing one of my best games of the season and with six minutes to go I receive a penalty for shooting the puck after the whistle. We looked at the replay and it was just an awful call. Skating over to the bench I told the ref that I shot the puck 10 feet wide on purpose and how could he make such a call. Not in specifically those terms and I received another 10. I have to learn to control my mouth a little bit, because I hurt the team when I'm in the penalty box. The other part of the emotion, the adrenaline, the intensity... that's always going to be there."

For Manganaro, that intensity usually translates into positives — it drives him to be better. In the Minutemen's game with Lowell, just one week after the UNH fiasco, he showed that the positive part of that emotion far outweighs the negative.

After the opening period, the No. 10 River Hawks looked to be on route to an easy victory, holding a 3-0 lead. But UMass wasn't ready to concede the Alumni Cup just yet. Led by two power play goals by Manganaro, UMass grabbed back the momentum.

"I really wanted to get back and show coach Mallen that I understood the message that he was trying to send, and that I was going to come back the same player, maybe better," he said. "I really wanted to get out of the chute really well against Lowell. It turned out to be one of my better games."

It turned out to be one of UMass' most exciting games as well. After the score remained 4-4 after regulation and the five-minute overtime, the game went to the shootout.

After the first six breakaway attempts the scored was locked at 4-4. When Brian Regan stoned Jeff Daw, the chance to put the game away lay in the hands of Sal Manganaro and he responded tucking the puck under Lowell goalie Martin Fillion to clinch the Alumni Cup.

"That's why I play the game, to feel that kind of pressure, to hear those people yelling and screaming as you're coming down the ice," Manganaro said. "That was probably the highlight of my career so far. It was unbelievable."

While the pressure is not the same, as hard as Manganaro worked against Lowell is as hard as he works in practice.

"One thing you can say about Sal Manganaro is that he has a top-notch work ethic," Mallen said. "He starts and ends every drill at the highest possible speed. And as a result he has become a much better player because of that."

"I come out ready to work every single day. I come out to practice every single day like its a game," Manganaro said. "Guys are always kidding me about why I'm so intense on a Monday. That's just the way that I am. Hopefully guys will feed off that."

Manganaro credits his father and an passionate love of the game as the roots of that intensity.

As a boy, while his friends were out trick-or-treating on Oct. 31, Manganaro would spend his Halloween at the North Quincy rink skating and working on his game.

"My Dad always said you have to enjoy the game, you have to want to play everyday to be a successful player. When I was younger, I was never on the A team. I knew I had to work hard," he said "I used to go to the rink on Halloween, while my friends were out doing whatever, because I knew nobody would be there so I could skate by myself.

"The way my Dad brought me up is that nothing is ever going to be handed to me. You have to enjoy playing. You have to want to work and get things done. Because of the way he brought me up it has happened that way."

Despite an exceptional high school career, nothing was handed to him in his college career either.

After a solid freshman year at Boston College, new coach Steve Cedorchuk didn't seem to see Manganaro as part of his equation.

When Mallen, a former assistant at BC was named the coach of the reinstated program at UMass, Manganaro followed him to Amherst.

It wasn't an easy move for Manganaro, who had held dreams of starring in an Eagle uniform from early on.

"I had to give up the scholarship to BC... I mean I loved the school," he said. "I wanted a degree from there since I was 14 years old. I gave that up knowing that I could be a better player."

And he has become that better player.

After scoring 11 goals in an injury shortened 1994-95 season, he has become one of the top offensive forces in the Minuteman lineup this season.

In the opening game of the season, a 6-3 win over Army, Manganaro had two goals and two assists to lead UMass.

Currently he is leading the team with 21 goals, including a UMass record 10 on the power play.

ANTHONY ROBERTS/SPECIAL TO COLLEGIAN

Senior Sal Manganaro brings intensity and emotion to the ice for the Minuteman hockey team.

The success he's had has allowed him to put the bad memories of BC behind him.

"I love this place. I loved BC and wanted to go there since I was 14. that was because I had no idea about this place," he said. "I got here and my blood turned from maroon and gold to maroon and white.

"Last year, I had something to prove to them. I was upset that they let me go and the way they did it, so I wanted to prove something to them and I think I did that last year. BC feels so long ago. There's no grudges anymore."

The lone connection to Chestnut Hill is Mallen, and Manganaro is quick to mention how much he feels he owes him.

"Coach Mallen has been unbelievably supportive," he said. "I've been with him for five years now. He was with me for the first two years at BC, but I couldn't develop because I wasn't getting the ice time. When I got here, he's really turned me into

Stretch run towards playoffs shaping up

At the outset of the NBA season many teams felt that they controlled their own destiny while others were scrambling for the light of day. Now, just a week into the second half of the year there is a clear indication of how the stretch run will shape up. With the league's trading deadline just days away, contenders are searching for that final piece while others begin to make vacation plans. Eastern Conference progress reports are in so let's check out those mid-term grades.

Darren Cohen on the NBA

Eastern Conference (listed in order of current standing)

Atlantic Division

1 Orlando Magic— Grade A
Strengths: Balance, Penny's poise, Shaq's determination, the ability to dominate at home. Weaknesses: Poor road record. For a dominant team such as Orlando, a 10-14 road record is unacceptable. The Magic have the ability and do match up well enough to beat the Bulls in a seven-game series; however, not all seven are played in Orlando.

2 New York Knicks— Grade B+. Strengths: Patrick Ewing, experience, a weak Eastern Conference schedule. Weaknesses: Age, scoring, internal griping. Recent trades showed that Knick management is fully prepared for next season, but what about this one? Don Nelson is the wrong coach for this team and off-season re-shaping will stay in the hands of management. Let's hope one more run isn't too far out of the question.

Men's swim brings perfect record to A-10s

By Jay Warner
Collegian Staff

The word around campus is that the Massachusetts Minutemen have the opportunity to finish the season with a perfect record and an Atlantic 10 Championship to go along with it.

No, they're not talking about the men's basketball team but rather, are referring to the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team. As coach Russ Yarworth's team travels to Buffalo for the three-day championships that begin today, he knows that the team finished the regular season undefeated but that the perfect record has no significance once the tournament begins.

"I hate to sound like it doesn't mean anything but it is irrelevant," Yarworth said. "What we have to do is go to the championships and win — bottom line."

After having spent the last week and a half in the pool every day, training hard, getting plenty of rest and focusing on what they have to do to be successful, Yarworth has great expectations and confidence with what his team is capable of accomplishing.

"I expect the whole team to perform well," he said. "We've got a great group of guys. No. 1 through No. 17, who are all ready to go."

The Minutemen will rely, in large part, on some of the team's younger swimmers who have begun to emerge as A- 10 stars. Topping the list is sophomore Sean Anderson who has become a premiere short distance swimmer, concluding the regular season by setting the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool record in the 50-yard freestyle.

Freshmen Brian Wisniewski and David Koritkowski will also play important roles for the Minutemen if they plan to stay in contention for the overall title.

"Certainly there are some standouts with Sean in the 50- free, (senior tri-captain Keith) McLarty in the individual medley, and (freshman) Geoff Gear is going to stand up really big in the butterfly," Yarworth said. "BJ Brannon, another freshman, is going to be solid as well I can just keep going down the list and point out kids that are going to shine."

For the younger swimmers this meet will be the first big- time, high-pressure collegiate meet, but Yarworth refuses to believe that this aspect will play a major role in how they may perform.

"They are going to be nervous but the swimmers at this level usually have a lot of experience coming into college," he said. "They have won big meets before. Hopefully, the senior leadership is going to have some bearing on how they perform also."

The senior leadership that Yarworth is hoping to see will mainly come from the senior tri-captains McLarty, Jeff Little and Dave LaPorte. These three individuals were chosen as captains for a number of reasons, none of which are more important than the positive influence they have on the freshman and sophomore swimmers.

"McLarty had an immediate impact as a big-time swimmer and also a great leader. He's got an attitude that keeps people loose at practice and you've got to have that because swimming is an intense sport, and can be overwhelming at times," Yarworth said. "His impact in the water and on the deck has been tremendous. Jeff Little has basically been our No. 1 distance man for four years. He's been tremendous to be able to rely on and I think that we'll be able to rely on him again this weekend.

"Dave LaPorte, being a local athlete from South Hadley, has been great in providing some local flavor for the team. He's developed tremendously since his freshman year and I think he should be a challenger this weekend. The word leadership is often over-used but he's also been a good leader, to have him organizing things and making sure the youngsters are doing okay."

Along with the tri captains, seniors John Luviano, Justin Murphy and Mike Shannon will be competing in the final meet of their careers. Yarworth made it clear that these three athletes were going to be sorely missed, mainly for their work ethic and ability to overcome adversity in their lives.

"Luviano is quite simply one of the hardest workers you can have and one of the most reliable," Yarworth said. "I consider them all very close friends but Luvie especially since he's been with me for two sports. It's great to have Justin back since he had a tough time here the first two years. He took some time off, and to have him return gives us the diving presence that we needed. He's a much grown- up and mature young man. To have Mike come out last year and start doing some diving was great. He gives us the opportunity to be competitive in a lot of dual

Minutewomen drop Flyers for 18th win

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

It's no fluke. Last night, the Massachusetts women's basketball team proved that it could win consistently beyond the walls of the William D. Mullins Center. In the second game of a four-match road trip, the Minutewomen travelled to Ohio where they dropped Dayton 65-53.

This win not only improved UMass' record to 18-7 overall, 10-4 in the Atlantic 10, but marked the team's sixth consecutive win. The first four tics in the win column came at home in the Mullins Center, but with yesterday's win in Dayton and last weekend's win at Fordham, the Minutewomen are at the top of their form.

The lackluster Flyers (8-16 overall, 3-11 A-10) gave the Minutewomen a game, keeping it close with the score knotted at 19 until the 5:36 mark of the first stanza, when senior captain Octavia Thomas drilled a jumper putting UMass up by two.

Massachusetts	65
Dayton	53

The Thomas jumper spurred an impressive 15-5 run which enabled the Minutewomen to secure a solid 10-point lead going into the half, 34-24.

Junior Beth Kuzmeski was once again the offensive force in the first half for UMass tallying 3-for-7 from outside the arc and sank a jumper adding up for 11 points in the opening stretch. By game's end, Kuzmeski earned her first double-double of the season and the third of her career with 14 points and 11 boards.

Another offensive power for the Minutewomen was junior Crystal Carroll who led UMass with 19 points. Carroll, after scoring eight points in the first half, stepped back onto the court to score 11 second half points helping the Minutemen push the lead to as much as 19 points.

Dayton, who has found its home in the basement of the A-10 West for most of the season, couldn't produce against a UMass squad that is gunning for a top two seed in the A-10 Tournament.

Renee Miller led the way for Dayton with 14 points, while Steph Mathu was close behind with 13. Everything the Flyers did, UMass did better. Dayton went only 9-26 from the field in the first half (8-20 in the second half), where the Minutewomen shot 13-31 and 11-20 respectively.

With just two more regular season games remaining before the post season, UMass is in rare form. The Minutewomen are currently ranked second in the A-10 East and have their sights set on the No. 1 spot, currently held by Rhode Island. After facing St. Bonaventure on Sat. they close their season with a "tournament preview" facing Rhode Island in Amherst.

LaFreniere and Co. deserve acclaim

Recognition and public attention usually doesn't come their way that often, because when you're a track and field athlete, there is very little glamour involved in what you do.

No television cameras. No closed practices to avoid the media. No press conferences after meets.

Mike Reiss

But if you read these pages this past Tuesday, you should have noticed the Massachusetts women's track team captured the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship and coach Julie LaFreniere was named the conference's coach of the year.

This is a remarkable accomplishment.

Whenever a season of hard work culminates into a championship, something is going right. Congrats to the A-10's coach and team of the year.

• It's hard to believe the softball team here at UMass has already played six games (2-4), as the team competed at the Coca-Cola Classic this past Friday, Saturday and Sunday in Phoenix, Arizona.

But which players would make up that team? The first names to be thrown into consideration would have to be All- America and Player of the Year candidates.

Marcus Camby, the leading candidate for the National Player of the Year Award, would most certainly be a choice for the U.S. team. Ray Allen of Connecticut, who some basketball experts believe to be the most complete player in the college game, would also be a lock.

Wake Forest's Tim Duncan, remember, would not be eligible because he was born in the Virgin Islands.

Other candidates would include Utah's Keith Van Horn, Georgetown's Allen Iverson, Villanova's Kerry Kittles, Memphis' Lorenzen Wright and Syracuse's John Wallace.

And what about Oklahoma's Ryan Minor, Kansas's Jacque Vaughn, N.C. State's Todd Fuller and Cincinnati's Danny Fortson? The top players in

CD&C receives grant; new computers funded

THANH VO/COLLEGIAN

Joseph Mulchay, president of Zerox of N.E., donated a check to Campus Design and Copies in the Student Union yesterday afternoon in order for them to purchase more updated computer equipment.

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

Campus Design and Copy (CD&C), located at 403 Student Union, has a three-fold purpose — to serve the University community with copying, design, building and note services; to provide undergraduate students with experience and training in collective management; and to promote to co- operative and collective movements.

Yesterday, Xerox of the Northeast, increased CD&C's chances of succeeding in their mission. They donated $5,000 to the co-op so it could purchase more contemporary computer equipment.

"We began to focus on smaller communities with the hope of giving back to them," said Joseph Mulcahy, president of Xerox of the Northeast. "It makes so much sense to support students, education and learning."

Junior co-manger Marry Lucier said Xerox has expressed a true interest in co-curricular learning.

"We have worked with Xerox from the beginning," she said. "They have been very generous and allowed the business to become more technologically efficient. Throughout the school year we have seen a large amount of new business and an actual profit."

Mulcahy told a story of his own college years at St. John's University, NYC. He said he began a job operating off-set printing presses without any knowledge about how to run them.

"I told my manager that if I couldn't learn the presses in one day, then I would work that day for free," Mulcahy said. "I worked at the company all the way through college."

Mulcahy compared his real life learning experience with Campus Design and Copy.

"It will be interesting to see how many of the CD&C co- managers move onto careers in the printing business. After all, here the students are learning to grow outside of the classroom," he said

Campus Design and Copy is a not-for-profit organization and operates under a "students working for students" model.

Fifteen paid student co-managers participate equally to perform the various business, marketing, design and production, and organizational demands of the business.

The student employees serve on 11 different committees in order to operate the business.

"Working at CD&C is great. It is unlike any other job," said sophomore Jerry Sivitsky. "I actually want the business to succeed."

Another sophomore co-manager, Sharon Furgason agreed. "This job is very demanding," she said. "You know that the ultimate success of the business depends on you."

"It is amazing that two years ago CD&C was in financial trouble; now we have turned the organization around. Now we are actually making a profit," said junior Maydad Cohen, a co-manager of CD&C.

Xerox has financed a Powermac, a larger printer, a Powerbook and upgraded computer programs, according to Cohen.

Lucier said CD&C will be proposing the purchase of a fax machine at their next weekly all-staff meeting.

Two computers are currently available. Any University student can access the new Powermac for $4 per hour, and any Registered Student Organization (RSO) which has an account with CD&C can use a computer for free.

"We are trying to support the other student businesses by becoming more efficient and available," Lucier said.

Film depicts lives of Harlem youths

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

It was an autobiography of Harlem, and an autobiography of those many young people who live it and experience it every day.

The documentary, Harlem Diary, directed by UMass alum Jonathan Stack, and written by Terry Williams, was shown in the Student Union Ballroom last night. Harlem Diary told the stories of nine Harlem youths and the experiences they face growing up and living day to day in the place that they call home.

Following the documentary, a panel discussion was held, including Nikki Matos and Damon Williams, two of the individuals documented in Harlem Diary, as well as Derrick Cheeseboro-Weaver, a UMass student, who was raised in Harlem.

Featured in the film is Nikki Matos, an 18-year-old single mother, who experiences one of her best friends die on the street by a random shooting. Matos, determined that his memory is not lost, organizes her neighbors to create a street play and paint a mural in his honor.

Matos, now attending junior college, hopes to become a filmmaker and a writer. During the panel discussion, Matos said, "I'm going to college for my son. I can't tell him that he has to go to school, when I dropped out myself." When asked if going to college was difficult, Matos responded, "No, it wasn't hard, the hardest thing was finding a babysitter."

Matos when asked about a comparison of Hoop Dreams to Harlem Diary responded, "Hoop Dreams and Harlem Diary are worlds apart. Hoop Dreams is about two kids hoping to get into the NBA. Harlem Diary is about our everyday lives, they're two totally different things. Just because you see black faces in two movies, don't mean they're the same, and if you made that connection, you didn't get the point."

The documentary also shows us Damon Williams, a 20- year-old, who in the beginning of his story is an inmate at Riker's Island prison. His drug-addicted mother dies of AIDS, his father had been in prison since Williams was seven and his brother was doing 7 to 10 years for homicide. The camera follows Williams after he is released from prison, and takes us to his young daughter's birthday party. He holds her as he talks of how much he loves her and wants to protect her.

During the panel, when asked what he wanted to do in the future, Williams responded, "I plan to get my GED, go to college, become a computer technician, and take care of my little girl."

Williams spoke about Harlem: "The community, is all over — Boston, California, Chicago, Texas, everywhere. I'm not just representing for Harlem, I'm representing for everywhere." Matos added, "There is a so-called ghetto everywhere, anywhere you go there is a ghetto."

Other youths documented in the film are, Christina Head, Bar Elliot, Jermaine Ashwood, Rasheem Swindell, Kahlil Hicks and Amir Williams-Foster.

Also featured in the film is Akida Bailey, a 21-year-old who leaves Harlem to attend Connecticut College, a predominantly white upper-middle class college. Bailey talks of how he didn't feel at home in Connecticut. He decides to leave Connecticut College, and spends a year back at Harlem.

Bailey expresses he changed within that year. Prior, all he wanted to do was make money, and he sees that he is no longer that same person. He ends up returning to Connecticut college to get his degree.

At the end of the documentary, Bailey says, "I've reconnected with my community. I know the power, beauty and resilience that exists in my home: Harlem. The future holds a tremendous amount of opportunities for me. I've always had dreams of being the next Martin Luther King, Marcus Garvey or Malcolm X — changing my community through experience. I plan to build a business from the ground up, in Harlem."

Harlem Diary will air on the Discovery Channel Feb. 25, at 7 p.m.

Second tethered satellite launched

By Marcia Dunn
Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Space shuttle Columbia and seven astronauts blasted into orbit yesterday on a complicated and risky mission to generate electricity by flying a satellite on the end of a 12.8-mile tether.

Columbia thundered into a hazy sky at 3:18 p.m., right on time.

"Arrivederci, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen and adios," Commander Andrew Allen said on behalf of the U.S.-Italian-Swiss crew moments before liftoff. "We'll see you in a couple of weeks."

It's the second trip into space for the tethered satellite, a half-ton metal ball that the crew will try to cast out on Saturday. Seconds into the flight, Allen reported an unusual engine reading, but Mission Control assured him that all three engines were operating well. An errant gauge was blamed.

Last time the satellite flew, four years ago, the tether jammed and the satellite got no farther than 840 feet from the shuttle and generated hardly any electricity. Several problems later were found, most notably a protruding bolt that NASA had added at the last minute.

NASA guarantees success this time.

"Everything has been tested and retested again to make sure that everything works," said Wesley Huntress Jr., NASA's space science chief.

"In terms of preparation for this flight, we've got the risk down as far as we can possibly get. This thing is ready to go." So is the crew.

Four of the astronauts who flew on the failed 1992 mission are back for another crack at the NASA and Italian Space Agency experiment.

"Venturi chilometri!" Italian astronaut Umberto Guidoni shouted as he headed to the launch pad. That's Italian for 21 kilometers, or 13 miles.

The four Americans, two Italians and one Swiss on the crew have spent nearly two years training in simulators on the ground for all sorts of emergencies: a tethered satellite swinging like a wayward pendulum, bobbing like an out-of-control yo-yo, whirling like a skip rope, or just plain stuck.

By taking advantage of Earth's magnetic field, scientists hope to generate 5,000 volts of electricity with the satellite and tether, which resembles a white boot lace and is made of copper, nylon and Teflon. The tethered satellite is supposed to soar above Columbia for two of the 14 flight days.

About 1,000 watts of power should be produced as current flows from the satellite down the tether to Columbia. Electron guns on the shuttle will shoot the electrons back into space and thereby close the electrical circuit.

"We're going to work and discover the properties of electricity in space very similar, very analogous to Benjamin Franklin sending up the kite with the key at the bottom," Allen said.

S. African school makes step towards desegregation

By Donna Bryson
Associated Press

POTGIETERSRUS, South Africa — In a scene reminiscent of U.S. desegregation battles, 16 black children protected by a police cordon walked through the gates of a formerly all-white school on Thursday — and into South African history.

But the school was practically empty. Only 20 of its almost 700 white students showed up. Glowering white parents watched the black students enter, and some vowed to establish a separate school, rather than have their children mix with blacks.

President Nelson Mandela's government hopes desegregation in this conservative, Afrikaner town 180 miles north of Johannesburg will set a national precedent and help wipe out lingering examples of the old apartheid education system.

Like many towns in rural South Africa, Potgietersrus (pronounced Pote-HEE-ters-roos) was once a whites-only community with a black township nearby. The nation's first all-race election in 1994, which brought Mandela to power, formally ended apartheid and heralded a new constitution providing equal rights.

Now a black mayor runs the town, and blacks have moved into formerly all-white neighborhoods.

Blacks have been integrated into most of South Africa's schools, but whites in Potgietersrus tried to maintain their hold on the state-subsidized primary school, blocking black children from enrolling. This year, with the law behind them, three black families — backed by the provincial government — filed a court challenge and won.

A Supreme Court ruling delivered last week and upheld on appeal Wednesday called the school's admissions policy racist.

Black parents were ecstatic, and the children seemed glad, too. Ten-year-old Thabang Thula only had to amble three blocks to the Potgietersrus elementary school Thursday instead of riding a bus across town to the impoverished black school she used to attend. "I was happy to go to school today," she told dozens of journalists waiting outside.

Afrikaners, the Dutch-descended white settlers of South Africa, fear that bringing blacks to their traditionally all-white schools will harm the quality of education and erode their culture, particularly the use of the Afrikaans language. Some fiercely oppose the mixing of races.

One white man outside the school Thursday, shouting in Afrikaans, cursed journalists covering the event and called the black students "apes" after his daughter burst into tears when mobbed by reporters and cameramen. He took her away without giving his name.

Others kept their children home, including Mof Erasmus, who watched the proceedings with a few other whites from about 300 feet down the road.

Du Bois' life examined in lieu of library dedication

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

1993 Pulitzer Prize winner, David Levering Lewis lectured to a full room at Memorial Hall yesterday afternoon. Lewis, a professor at Rutger's University and author of W.E.B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868-1909, spoke on the life of W.E.B. Du Bois.

Lewis describes Du Bois as, "The premier architect of the civil rights movement in the United States. Du Bois was among the first to last the international implications for the struggle for racial justice."

He said that Du Bois became more and more radical that finally he went from "civil rights maverick" to a "full blown Marxist."

Over time Lewis said, the color line that W.E.B. Du Bois spoke of changed into one that included a "culture line" and a "class line." Du Bois began to see the problem of race in the United States as encompassing the more complex problems of the "distributions of global wealth."

Lewis told of how, in 1910, Du Bois resigned as a lecturer at Atlanta University and became the editor for The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, (NAACP) newspaper, The Crisis Magazine. For 14 years Du Bois worked for the NAACP, and saw it change from a small group to a larger, more bureaucratic corporate board.

Du Bois's continued to run the magazine his way, making the policies of the magazine independent of the NAACP's board of directors. According to Lewis, during his time with the NAACP, Du Bois continually demanded "full civil rights and, complete racial integration."

However, according to Lewis, readers of The Crisis Magazine were "startled" to find two articles in the January and March 1934 issues, which were titled, "Segregation, and Separation and Self Respect." Lewis says that, Du Bois asserted that since American Negroes are already forced to live in segregation, that they should use this forced segregation to turn it to their advantage.

Lewis quoted Du Bois, "It is the race conscious blackman cooperating together in his only institutions and movements who will eventually emancipate the colored race."

In the end Du Bois chose to resign in 1936 rather than be forced to be removed. He then devoted himself to teaching and research in the south.

It was between the years of 1935 to 1948 Du Bois, according to Lewis, "had a period of talented tense Marxism," and the years of 1948 to 1961 would mark Du Bois's "red radical period."

At age 82 in 1950, Du Bois ran for the U. S. Senate from New York under the American Labor Party ticket. Lewis said, "Out of five million voters 205,000 liked his campaign speeches enough to vote for him.

"Martin Luther King was something of an enigma for Du Bois," said Lewis. He said, "Du Bois, musing about the 1955 Montgomery bus boycott, [himself] being an agnostic, admitted that he is expected to live and see many things, but never a baptist preacher in the role of a civil

Clinton defense fund rebounds after article

By Harry F. Rosenthal
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Donations to President Clinton's legal defense fund were declining at the end of last year but rebounded after the president said his savings might be consumed by bills in the Paula Jones and Whitewater cases.

How much of a boost the fund got won't be known until the next trustees' report in six months. But "it's been a significantly better month than the previous months have been," Michael H. Cardozo, a lawyer who oversees the trust, said Thursday.

In its first 18 months, ending Dec. 31, the trust received $971,941 and paid $541,134 to four law firms. That left the president's outstanding legal expenses at $1.3 million.

The debt was eased considerably in January when two insurance companies paid $891,880.42 under an umbrella policy to Clinton's lawyers in the Jones lawsuit. Jones, a former Arkansas state employee, has accused Clinton of sexual harassment.

The defense fund had already paid $200,000 to the firm in the Jones case, Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. That money was refunded and used to pay down Clinton's debt to another law firm. The fund was established by President and Mrs. Clinton in June 1994. It received more than $600,000 from individual contributors of $1,000 and under in the first six-month period, more than $250,000 in the second, and $105,000 in the latest.

"We have adhered to the position taken by the Office of Government Ethics that the trust cannot solicit, promote or publicize itself and we have not in any way done so," Cardozo said.

Last month, however, the White House publicly agreed with the main point of a magazine report that the Clintons were at the edge of a financial crisis because of legal bills estimated at more than $2 million a year.

"I feel badly that 20 years of our hard effort in savings may go away," Clinton said then. "But if I stay healthy, I'll be able to pay my bills and earn a pretty good living."

Cardozo said the article and the presidential statement resulted in a flurry of contributions that are not reflected in the year-end report.

"Prospective contributors have to find us," he said. "Without publicity it's not on their radar screen. ... It would be very easy to defray these costs if we could make even the most discreet, decorous appeal, but we don't do that."

The ethics office believes that the president, as a federal employee, cannot solicit defense funds and that those working on his behalf can't do it either.

The list shows contributors of as little as $1 and many at $1,000. Among the latter are investment banker Ruger C. Altman of New York; John H. Bryan, chairman of the Sara Lee Corporation; Lloyd Cutler, the former presidential counsel; Lloyd N. Hand, a legislative lobbyist; W. DeVier Pierson, a registered foreign lobbyist, and Felix Rohatyn, whom Clinton had wanted to nominate to be vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

ELECTION '96

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

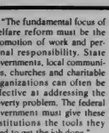
The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are questions and answers from the series. Some questions are from a survey by the nonpartisan group Project Vote Smart. Only Steve Forbes, repeatedly invited to take part, has not responded.

Do you favor providing tax incentives for companies to hire and train homeless people who want to work?

Bill Clinton

"By creating partnerships between the federal government and local communities, small businesses and ordinary citizens, we can renew economic activity in our disadvantaged urban and rural areas. My empowerment zone initiative offers $3.5 billion in tax incentives and flexible block grants to encourage new private investments in 104 economically distressed communities across America. We have also created a national network of non-traditional community banks which uses federal seed money to leverage billions of dollars more in private capital for community renewal."

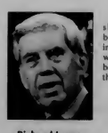


Bob Dole

"The fundamental focus of welfare reform must be the promotion of work and personal responsibility. State governments, local communities, churches and charitable organizations can often be effective at addressing the poverty problem. The federal government must give these institutions the tools they need to get the job done."

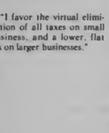
...amar Alexander

"I favor turning the $25 billion in federal job training programs into job training vouchers for anyone changing jobs or out of work."



Richard Lugar

"Yes. Private employers should be encouraged to become more deeply involved in the effort to move people off welfare. Such incentives should be monitored closely to ensure their effectiveness."



Pat Buchanan

"I favor the virtual elimination of all taxes on small business, and a lower, flat tax on larger businesses."

Several options in Jewish community after graduation

By Anna Feder
Collegian Staff

After enduring the perils of the University of Massachusetts for four or five long years, many students are plagued with one major dilemma — life after college. For those interested in strengthening their connection to the Jewish community there are several options to consider.

Sherut, La'am and the World Union of Jewish Students are year-long work programs in Israel. To find out more information, contact National Hillel.

"I learned about Israel not only as 'that place they show on the news,' 'the holy land' or 'the place of the peace process,' but as an incredible, modern country with wonderful, caring people."
— Beth Seewald

Another program of interest is Project Otzma. It is a 10- month work program, beginning in August and ending in June. It teaches valuable leadership skills to recent college graduates. Through the project, students can work on a kibbutz or in an immigration absorption center. Toward the end of the program those involved have the option of working in a development. Ninety of the applicants are selected and immersed in Israeli culture, keeping in touch with, but not entirely surrounded by, other participants. Seminars on Israeli society are available to help the transition.

Beth Seewald, current Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellowship recipient and Outreach Coordinator for Hillel, participated in the program last year.

"The decision constitutes the best decision I have ever made," said Seewald. "I worked with troubled children, motivated teenagers, and immigrant senior citizens. I taught English, and I learned Hebrew. I lived with Americans from my group, but formed close relationships with Israelis. I learned about Israel not only as 'that place they show on the news,' 'the holy land' or 'the place of the peace process,' but as an incredible, modern country with wonderful, caring people."

Shawmut bank replaced by Fleet

By Roseann Cohen
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Many University of Massachusetts students were surprised this weekend when they found that Shawmut Bank had been replaced by Fleet Bank and First Massachusetts Bank uptown.

Shawmut merged with Fleet Bank last year, and as decided in the merger agreement, were obligated to sell 13 branches. First Bank of Massachusetts, operating under Banknorth Group, Inc., bought the 13 branches, four of which have opened in the Pioneer Valley. Among those four branches are former Shawmuts at Triangle St. in Amherst and North King St. in Northampton.

"We opened up on Tuesday in Northampton, Amherst, Greenfield and Hadley. Students should have received their ATM cards and other communications we've sent out by then," said First Massachusetts spokesman David Reville.

He explained that not all former Shawmut clients would have their accounts under First Massachusetts. "If they had Shawmut accounts and are switching to us, it depends on what Shawmut branch they first became affiliated with," he said.

Some clients were annoyed with the ATMs at First Massachusetts, when they were unable to get cash over the long weekend. However, according to Reville, the problems the bank was having have now been taken care of.

"There were over 100,000 accounts that we converted this weekend," Reville said. "We admit there were some glitches in our conversion that we've straightened out and we regret any inconvenience we've caused our customers."

Reville also said that, although there are minor changes in the way First Massachusetts will handle accounts, there will be no changes in checking accounts. To compensate for the conversion from a larger bank to a smaller one, the bank is "giving five free transactions per month for when clients use their ATM cards at ATMs other than within our network," according to Reville.

Former Shawmut customers that found new Fleet signs and the Fleet logo at their old bank expressed mixed feelings about the merger.

"I was outraged by the merger. It appeared clear and simple that the owner of the bank decided to make an extra $5 or $10 million with no regard for the employees who would lose their jobs," said Farnsworth Lobenstine, an Amherst resident.

A spokesperson for Fleet was unavailable to comment.

Amherst resident Diane Flaherty had held reservations about the merger for different reasons, but expressed optimism.

"I wasn't initially pleased with it because I had heard of charges against Fleet for being racist in giving out mortgages," Flaherty said. "However, I had a problem over the weekend with getting money out to my daughter who was traveling in Asia. The ATMs were shut down, but they seemed to bend over backwards to help me. So, for the time being, I'm willing to give them a chance."

UMass student Christina Bramble was very pleased with the merger, from the first time she was notified of the change.

"Obviously [Fleet] had the money to take Shawmut over, so there are going to be branches in other states and communities as well," said the senior psychology student. "I'm going to be graduating in May and it's going to be a lot more convenient for me because there are Fleet Banks in many more areas around here than Shawmut," she said.

rights militant."

In 1950, Du Bois said that King was no Ghandi. "Ghandi submitted," Du Bois said, "but he also found a positive program to offset his negative refusal to use violence."

On October 1, 1961, Du Bois applied for membership in the Communist party at the age of 93. Lewis cited Du Bois saying, "Today I have reached a firm conclusion, capitalism cannot contain itself, it is doomed to self destruction."

"Just as African Americans in the United States ... will be confined to the lowest wage group, so the people of the developing world face subordination within the political scheme of things."

Lewis ended his lecture by saying, "In the course of his years, W.E.B. Du Bois attempted virtually every possible solution to the problems of the twentieth century, scholarship, propaganda, integration cultural and economic separation, politics, international communism, expatriation, and Third World solidarity."

Primary observations

Dave Copeland

Not even the half dozen drinks we had sipped in the hotel bar could have prepared us for the scene at the Dole Campaign Headquarters as the New Hampshire primary drew to a close on Tuesday night.

Even as Pat Buchanan was being projected as the primary's winner by all of the major networks, Dole's campaign headquarters at the Manchester Holiday Inn was a ruckus celebration. A song, it's only lyrics being "Dole in '96" had been quickly improvised. The governor of New Hampshire, Steve Merrill, was leaping around the stage in the midst of other jumping G.O.P. faithfuls as if he had been sipping a steady stream of extra-dry martinis since noon.

"Who said Republicans don't have rhythm?" he boomed into the microphone.

Well, I did, for starters. But that wasn't important now. What was important was that my colleague Frank and I were slightly drunk, extremely tired and extremely out of place. It was the fourth and final stop in a day that had started at 6:30 a.m. in Northampton and was now ending in a fit of paranoia on my part.

"We should go," I finally said.

And thus, our day ended with a long drive home that put our mileage total at 356 for a 16-hour span.

We met Randy Allen of Wheatfield, Indiana in Portsmouth, the first stop of our campaign coverage. Aside from having corn in his hair, breath like manure and a slims green zit protruding from the side of his nose, Randy was a halfway decent kid who was holding a sign in support of Richard Lugar as part of his high school's government class field trip.

By the time the polls closed that night Randy would be on the bus for the 22-hour ride back home while Lugar would be looking at the fragments of a Presidential campaign in despair. Part of the appeal of the whole primary process is the sport of it — men are made or broken in a single day.

By the time the game rolls into Indiana, Lugar should be long out of the race, denying Randy's family the opportunity to vote for their offspring's political hero.

Such is the story of the political equivalent to the first round of the NCAA basketball tournament.

Our intention had been to throw eggs at as many Republican candidates as possible, earning points for each hit scored. Point values were established based on the candidates' standings in the morning's polls.

But by the time the day ended, the only candidate we had seen was Bob Dornan, who was wandering around the lobby of Dole headquarters. He was as confused about why he was in the Presidential race as the rest of the nation was.

By our score sheet, Dornan was worth negative 25 points, so we decided to spare him the egg. Dornan has achieved zero percent of the vote in both the Iowa caucus and the New Hampshire primary, meaning that you and I are now in a statistical dead heat with the man who did not even bother to set up his own campaign headquarters in New Hampshire.

Aside from Bewildered Bob Dornan, the rest of the Dole scene was in 100% support of the Senator. Parents gave their babies to Governor Merrill, who slapped Dole stickers on the infants' foreheads and staggered around the stage in a mock dance with them.

Why do politicians gravitate to babies and children so much? Am I to believe the two 10-year-old girls we saw completely decked out in Dole, white and blue really understand what is going on? I'm just thankful that Merrill didn't drop any of those babies as he paraded on in his rhythmless dance.

Aside from Concord, the only other stop we made was in Durham, where we tried to get the feel of the student population at the University of New Hampshire.

In a lot of ways, UNH can be compared to UMass. Still, everybody we saw there looked and dressed exactly alike. The people at L.L. Bean must have a direct delivery route to UNH, because if you didn't know any better you would have assumed that Bean was the only clothing option available to the students at UNH.

At The New Hampshire, the student newspaper that uses a very nice office to put out a very crappy paper, we were told by news editor Kara Kozirian that most students were annoyed by the negative advertising that had dominated campaign. Most of the candidates had stopped near Durham, but none had actually made an effort to address student concerns.

And why should they? The hairy hippie manning the "Rock The Vote" table in the UNH equivalent of the Student Union said, "Some students stop and take a minor interest, but most just walk on by." Despite providing information on how to register and vote, as well as providing a free shuttle bus to the polling places, our Rock The Vote contact told us that UNH students had been ambivalent at best.

Fortunately, I said with my tongue shoved deep in my cheek, things are much better here at the politically concrete playground.

The drive home from New Hampshire was as foggy as my now even more muddled outlook on politics in America. I can't make sense of it anymore, but I know that something is definitely wrong with the system when Buchanan, who as a Nixon speech writer called himself "the meanest man in politics," is about to take control of the Republican party and Alexander is viewed as a folk hero, not because of shady financial doings in the past, but because of he wears flannel.

I wear flannel and I am in a statistical dead heat with Bob Dornan for the Republican presidential nomination. Would you vote for me for President?

Maniacs snooze, fans lose

Chris Stamm

Did anyone happen to see a one armed man hopping the fence of Garber Field on the morning of basketball student ticket pick up day? Somebody had better call Robert Stack because we have an "Unsolved Mystery" on our hands.

Student ticket distribution begins at the Curry Hicks Cage at 7 a.m. Word around campus has it that student tickets for Saturday's George Washington game ran out some time around 9:15 a.m., while there were still tickets available for Wednesday's game against St. Joe's until about 11 a.m.

Does this make sense? There are 3,500 student tickets available for each game, and the ticket office told the Collegian that almost all 500 Minutemaniacs picked up their GW tickets, while only 300 Minutemaniacs picked up tickets to St. Joe's. How 'bout those Maniacs. 200 of them blowing off a game. Are they dedicated fans, or what?

Why is it that 3,000 tickets for GW sold out in just over two hours, yet it took another two hours to distribute 200 tickets for the St. Joe's game?

Does this mean that students were actually turning down tickets to the St. Joesph's game, the final home game of the season in which the Minutemen could go undefeated? Something smells funny, and it isn't just the Turkey Divan in the D.C.'s.

Seven student's per minute turned down tickets to St. Joe's? That is just plain wrong.

It seems to me that the only people who don't have to worry come ticket distribution day are the Minutemaniacs. However, trying to become one of their illustrious group is almost impossible.

Last year, I waited outside the Cage for a sacred application along with 2,000 of my closest friends. When the guy stepped out with a stack of applications, it looked like a World Wrestling Federation "Royal Rumble." People were pushing, pulling and scrapping for an application. When the lottery results came in, the vast majority of us had many early morning wake-ups to look forward to.

What really gets my goat is that, not only do Minutemaniacs turn down tickets that they get in advance, but there is bound to be to someone in their numbers who doesn't know Marcus Camby from Ronald McDonald.

The bottom line is, the ticket distribution system here at UMass needs some work. Each week brings a different scenario. Maybe they'll be tickets at noon, maybe they'll be sold out by 8 o'clock. I guess I'll just have to wait until I'm a wealthy alumnus to be able to sleep in the morning.

Honoring W.E.B. Du Bois

Martin F. Jones

Dr. William Edward Burghardt Du Bois is without question the greatest revolutionary in the history of the United States. Born February 23, 1868, in the western Massachusetts town of Great Barrington, W.E.B Du Bois would grow in later years to become a world-renowned scholar, activist and philosopher.

Graduating at the top of his class from Great Barrington High School in 1884, Du Bois went on to attend Fisk University and later graduated from Harvard University cum laude with a Bachelor of Arts degree in 1890. After doing some graduate work at Harvard, Du Bois traveled to Germany, where he attended the University of Berlin from 1892-94. After teaching Greek and Latin at Wilberforce University in Ohio, W.E.B. Du Bois married his first wife Nina Gomer.

One hundred years ago in 1896, Du Bois became the first African-American to earn a Ph.D. from Harvard, his dissertation entitled: "The Suppression of the African Slave Trade." Du Bois would go on to teach at the University of Pennsylvania and Atlanta University from 1896-1910. Soon thereafter, Du Bois published the landmark works: "The Philadelphia Negro" and "The Souls of Black folks."

The rest of Du Bois' life was a glorious one, indeed, for an activist who accomplished such an endless succession of achievements. In 1919, for example, Du Bois called a Pan-African Congress in Paris, one of the first of a series of international efforts to unite blacks in America and the Third World. He did this during the period between the First World War and 1945. At the founding conference of the United Nations in 1945, Du Bois attended as a representative of the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights organization, which he co-founded along with socialist activists Mary Ovington, William English Walling and Charles Edward Russell.

Du Bois also met and corresponded with such world leaders and Chairman Mao Tse Tung, Vladimir Lenin, Nikita Krushchev and Jawaharlal Nehru. He traveled extensively throughout Africa, Asia, the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe and The Peoples Republic of China.

W.E.B. Du Bois wrote dozens of books and hundreds of articles, many of them written during his tenure as the editor of The Crisis magazine, the organ of the NAACP. Du Bois' writings would eventually lay down the foundation of the Civil Rights Movement, Pan-Africanism and the Non- Aligned Movement.

On August 27, 1963, W.E.B. Du Bois passed away while residing in his adopted home country of Ghana, a newly independent nation in west Africa. He had settled in Ghana at the request of President Kwame Nkruma to edit the Encyclopedia Africana and was buried there at a state funeral, with his remains now entombed in a special shrine on the city of Accra.

His legacy to mankind has been one of unbridled scholarship, tireless activism, sustained growth and endless perserverence and uncompromising conviction. Unfortunately, this legacy has been buried for many decades under mountains of American anti-communist propaganda.

Yes, Dr. Du Bois was a communist, applying for membership in the US Communist Party in 1961. This decision was also publicly supported by none other than Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., seven years later at an event commemorating the centennial anniversary of Du Bois' birth.

On February 23, 1968, at Carnegie Hall in New York City, Dr. King called Du Bois a "militant, black, genius." With regards to Du Bois' membership in the US Communist Party, as well as his many years of work as a socialist activist, Dr. King stated the following:

"We cannot talk of Dr. Du Bois without recognizing that he was a radical all of his life. Some people would like to ignore the fact that he was a Communist in his later years. It is worth noting that Abraham Lincoln warmly welcomed the support of Karl Marx during the Civil War and corresponded with him freely. In contemporary life, the English-speaking world has no difficulty with the fact that Sean O'Casey was a literary giant of the 20th century and a Communist or that Pablo Neruda is generally considered the greatest living poet though he also served in the Chilean Senate as Communist. It is time to cease muting the fact Dr. Du Bois was a genius and chose to be a Communist. Our irrational, obsessive anti-communism has led us into too many quagmires to be retained as if it were a mode of scientific thinking."

Today, on Dr. Du Bois birthday, February 23, 1996, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will formally dedicate the W.E.B. Du Bois Library at the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts. This 26-story tower of knowledge is a fitting tribute to the man, W.E.B. Du Bois, a living tower of knowledge, wisdom, conviction and dedication to the plight of the oppressed masses of the world. Since 1973, the world's largest collection of Du Bois' articles, papers and personal correspondences have been housed in the special collections archives on the 25th floor.

This rich treasure chest of history includes over 180,000 documents and some 700 photographs. It is also important to note that Du Bois widow, Shirley Graham Du Bois, honored a wish by her late husband to have his work housed in a public university. Du Bois was a strong advocate of universal public higher education, and for the collection to be free and open to the public.

As the great architect of the modern Civil Rights Movement, we all owe Dr. Du Bois a great deal of gratitude for his tireless activism in the early 20th century, which produced such organizations as The Niagara Movement and later the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

History will show, despite years of anti-communist repression of his life's work and contributions to society, that W.E.B. Du Bois laid down the very intellectual, philosophical and organizational foundation for the vast organizational changes that transformed America during the 20th century. These changes included F.D.R.'s New Deal, the landmark civil rights cases in the '50s-'60s, and Lyndon Johnson Great Society Plan and War on Poverty.

And when Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. eulogized Du Bois at the great 1963 March on Washington, following his passing the previous day, it became clear to all that a great fiery torch, one which had guided many generations of revolutionary activism, had been passed from the elder statesman, Dr. Du Bois, to the young, brilliant, and charismatic minister, Dr. King. Later that afternoon, King would deliver what was perhaps the greatest address ever given in the history of mankind, inspiring a new generation of activists and revolutionaries the world over.

This is why we must honor Dr. W.E.B. Du Bois. We must always challenge and question the status quo without fear or accommodation. We must educate ourselves and develop into strong, wise, and learned men and women. We must gaze deep into our past, to garner a real sense of our true historical, philosophical and cultural roots. We must survey and build a greater appreciation of the struggles waged by our ancestors. We must engage in extensive research of the most prominent leaders and activists of our time, including Dr. Du Bois, Dr. King, El-Hajj Malik El-Shabazz (Malcolm X), and Marcus Mosiah Garvey. We must address without hesitation, injustice, racism, exploitation and bigotry whenever and wherever these evils emerge, striking them down completely from all of existence. We owe it not only to Dr. Du Bois, but ultimately to ourselves.

In the conclusion of his speech commemorating W.E.B. Du Bois' birthday centennial, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. said:

"In closing, it would be well to remind white America of its debt to Dr. Du Bois. When they corrupted Negro history they distorted American history, because Negroes are too big a part of the building of this nation to be written out of it without destroying scientific history. White America, drenched with lies about Negroes, has lived too long in a fog of ignorance. Dr. Du Bois gave them a gift of truth for which they should be eternally indebted to him."

Thank you, Dr. Du Bois, and happy birthday.

The hilarious trio, The Roches, take the stage at the Iron Horse Saturday night.

Band to celebrate anniversaries

Legendary alternative group to play at Iron Horse Music Hall

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

Seventeen years ago the Roches introduced themselves to the music world on "We" — the opening track on their self- titled debut album. It was a comical tune. 1979 also saw the opening of the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. For two special shows this Saturday, the Roches will lead the anniversary celebrations with their unique, humorous sibling harmonies.

Maggie, Terre and Suzzy Roche have been singing since their early childhood years. During the early '70s the three sisters wrote songs with their father to help local Democrats campaign. Paul Simon heard them and invited Maggie and Terre to sing back-up on There Goes Rhymin' Simon in 1974. The next year, the two sisters released Seductive Reasoning with help from Simon as co-producer.

All three sisters joined forces together to form the Roches in 1979 and their debut album is a masterpiece. Recently SPIN ranked The Roches as one of the top 100 alternative albums ever. Robert Fripp, of King Crimson, gained praise for his excellent production.

Since their debut album the Roches have continued to carve out their own niche in the music world. They are not folk or pop or rock or blues or easy listening, they are simply the Roches, a hilarious trio that keeps crowds wanting more and more.

1985 saw the vocal group pair up with Fripp again on "Keep On Doing" which features the band's legendary version of Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." Since then the band has had continued success with a Christmas album, We Three Kings and a children's album Will You Be My Friend? Their most recent album Can We Go Home Now has also received praise.

The Roches perform at the Iron Horse Music Hall Saturday night at 7 p.m. and 10 p.m. The show is all ages. Call the club for more details.

Musical mosaic created on new album

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

COURTESY COMPASS RECORDS

Kate Campbell creates a mosaic of musical styles on her new album.

Drawing images from her childhood and painting vivid pictures of life in the South, Kate Campbell has created a musical mosaic on her debut CD Songs From the Levee.

The Mississippi native exhibits literary genius in her songwriting. Bearing a resemblance to vivid, raw writers such as Dorothy Allison and Bobby Ann Mason, she takes the listener on a picturesque journey through our nations lower region.

The album begins with the autobiographical "Mississippi Me." Here she recounts memories of her own childhood as a preacher's daughter with lines such as, "Daddy was a preacher in sledge/ We were living on gospel and beans." The listener is then accquainted with a beautician who ironically has the worst hair in town and a banker who is convinced he is Elvis. In this song, Campbell pays homage to her home state, exhibiting a proudness and addressing both the good and bad nuances of living in the south.

Campbell mentions Eudora Welty in her liner notes and this inspiration is clearly evident in her songwriting. Her songs combine Welty's use of regional detail with a strong sense of place and time — creating heartfelt tales and chilling accounts.

In "A Cotton Field Away," she tackles one of the South's heaviest burden, racism. It begins with soundbites from leaders George Wallace and Martin Luther King Jr., and then transcends into what seems like a recounting of Campbell's own feeling on the issue. She ends explaining, "They say things have changed/ But we still stand/ A cotton field away." It is the memories of the cotton field that still separates white and black.

Although Campbell was born in New Orleans, she spent her childhood in the town of Sledge, Miss. where her father was the pastor of a local Baptist church. Her first musical experience was in the form of a ukelele, two years later she began piano lessons. She started playing guitar and writing songs while she was still in elementary school. During high school her family moved to Orlando where she sang in the high school jazz ensemble.

Musical ability aside, her literary talent comes as no surprise. Campbell holds a masters degree from Auburn University in Southern History. In 1988 she moved to Nashville where she taught history at the college level, all while pursuing her dream of songwriting. She signed her first publishing contract with Fame and a recording contract with Compass Records in 1994.

Campbell brings her southern flair to the Ironhorse this Sunday night where she will play alongside Canadian singer Garnet Rogers. Songs From the Levee combines rich talent, superior vocals, and enlightening songwriting, much like her counterparts Mary Chapin-Carpenter and Nanci Griffith. A wonderful portrait of Southern life, Songs is a compelling, honest account of one woman's views. If there is a country section in your music archives, this one must be added.

Kate Campbell will perform at the Iron Horse Sunday, Feb. 25 at 7 p.m. For information call 586-8686.

Cutting edge of hardcore at Pearl St.

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

In the last couple of years hardcore has taken on a new look, splinting into different genres such as emo and metal. At the same time, the once bastion for hardcore music, Revelation Records, has begun to sign bands such as Shades Apart who are not as heavy, fast, or intense as Gorilla Biscuits or Youth of Today. But they are heaviest on the label today.

Shades Apart comes at the listener with a hammering style of music. However, rather then beating the listener over the head with tough-guy or straight-edge lyrics they deal with things on a more personal level. Ed Brown, lead singer and lyricist, writes from a very introspective level providing the listener with a real look into his emotions. While the band's musical style won't inspire any pig piles or many stage dives, you can still dance to it.

Shift, like Shades Apart, represents the newer generation of hardcore bands. In fact, Shift owes more to post-hardcore pioneers Quicksand then anyone else. After Shift's first EP Pathos, many critics pegged them as a mere Quicksand clone. Yet on their last album Spacesuit, Shift, with the help of producer Richie Birkenhead, established their own unique sound. While Shift may not be as fast as some of their hardcore peers, their insightful lyrics and time changes will certainly have the crowd moving.

Both bands are prime examples of the more progressive hardcore scene. Baby Gopal, Empty and Pinballed open up the show.

Shades Apart and Shift play Pearl Street Feb 25 at 7:30 p.m. The show is all ages. Tickets are $6 in advance and $7 at the door. Tickets are available in advance from the Northampton Box Office, For the Record and Tix Unlimited.

Al Pacino overacts in City Hall

COURTESY MYLES ARONOWITZ

Al Pacino stars as the mayor in the new film City Hall.

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

CITY HALL
Directed by Harold Becker
with Al Pacino, John Cusack, Bridget Fonda
Playing at Hampshire Six

The dark, dingy, crime-ridden city of New York is decaying, and the source of the infection is the corrupt City Hall.

In City Hall, director Harold Becker and Al Pacino's first joint effort since Sea of Love, the inner workings and ideals behind the direction of the city are analyzed by those who actually run it.

Pacino stars as Mayor John Pappas — the man who knows how to get the job done. A real mayor's mayor, Pappas strikes an equal balance between his politics and his personal practices, with all intents and purposes focused on how to better the city. He is realistic, and often times coolly emotional, as displayed in the tactics he utilizes in the city's latest crisis.

A young black schoolboy is shot and killed in the crossfire of an Italian drug dealer and a Hispanic off-duty police officer — the act itself symbolizing the volatile situations and racial tensions at the heart of the city's crime problem.

The city is thrown into chaos. What was the unauthorized officer doing there, and why was the drug dealer only on probation when his sentence should have been 10-20 years? The most important question to be answered — who's to blame for the death of an innocent child?

The man who carries this burden is the young, idealistic baby-faced deputy mayor from Louisiana, Kevin Calhoun — played perfectly by John Cusack. Calhoun is the "Mayor's boy" — Pappas' right hand man — a grinning devotee who hopes to get Pappas elected president.

Calhoun can't shake the crushing weight of the questions surrounding the boy's death. Although the mayor lectures him on damage control, Calhoun unearths more and more illegal activities and finds their roots growing out of City Hall.

Pacino delivers an overly-powerful performance — particularly the scene in which he speaks, uninvited, at the little boy's funeral. While he professes how he will "fight back" vociferously, standing over the boy's coffin, the grief on the face of the father is illustrated so poignantly. Pacino's overacted speech is completely inappropriate for a funeral. There is no difference between the mayor's press conference speeches and the eulogy.

Bridget Funda's token character is so extremely underused, we often forget why she is there. She plays the lawyer for the cop's widow who both lights the spark of interest under Calhoun about the situation and about her.

One of the worms Calhoun digs up is a Brooklyn ward boss, played by Danny Aiello (who deliver's the movie's best performance.) Just like Pappas, he's got his finger on the pulse of the city, and seems wholesome, though we know he's not.

Like the mayor himself, City Hall tries to tackle too many problems, and winds up getting caught in the whirlwind of them. When the sequences are neat and tight, the film is at its best; unfortunately it doesn't stay that way for long, and falls victim to its own predictability and formula. C+

UMass men ready for New Englands

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

For Massachusetts head coach Ken O'Brien and his men's indoor track and field squad, motivation will not be a factor at the New England Championship meet today and tomorrow.

"The kids who are the type of athletes to compete at this championship level have been looking [forward] to this kind of meet since they started their training last summer," O'Brien said. "Their enthusiasm and their focus has been building since their first day of training."

Freshman Tom Toye, already the school record holder in the indoor 200m dash, leads a cast of 16 individual entrants and three relay teams into Boston for the second of three post season championship meets.

The Minutemen fought the weather last weekend to get to Rhode Island for the Atlantic 10 Championship, coming home with a school–best third place finish. They also came home disappointed in their overall performance as they expected to compete for the A-10 title.

There were, however, many solid performances in Kingston, RI, and O'Brien feels that his top–tier athletes will be able to use those performances as a springboard for the New England Championships and, consequently, the IC4A meet.

"You want to look good in a meet prior to the next championship meet. You don't want to leave off on a bad note," O'Brien said.

The A-10 meet was a mixed bag for the Minutemen, as far as the level of performances are concerned. Three athletes came up big in qualifying for New Englands at the last possible meet while there were many uninspired performances.

Sophomores Chris Conner (400m) and Scott Price (200m) and senior Ethan Nedeau (mile) will all be making the trip to Boston. Price has been battling a hamstring injury all season, and looks to continue his comeback without furthering his injury before the outdoor season.

Conner will be the Minutemen's top entry in the 400m since Toye will be concentrating on the 200m sprint. Conner will be joined by Neil Concepcion in one of four events in which O'Brien has entered two athletes.

O'Brien has three runners set to compete in the mile race — Massachusetts' deepest event at New Englands. Mike Maceiko and Walter Stock will be joining Nedeau. Maceiko, a junior from Deer Park, NY, is UMass's top miler and will be going to the IC4As as well.

Ron Tauro left a day early to prepare to compete in the pentathlon, along with the high hurdles and high jump.

All four will flirt with .300 for most of the season and can make a living doubling off the Green Monster. They are all legitimate double–digit home run threats, playing half their games in Friendly Fenway, and all four are continuing to improve defensively, Valentin being the most solid of the quartet.

The outfield, on the other hand, is something of an anomaly.

Jose Canseco's contract calls for a significant amount of time in right field, and with the top four pitchers in the projected rotation being right handed that means a lot of left handed bats. And left handed hitters mean a lot of chances and troubles for Canseco.

Red Sox stalwart Mike Greenwell is solidly planted in front of the Monster, and should contribute his usual under– rated season (.300, 15HR, 75RBI) hitting in the fifth or sixth spot.

Centerfield looks to be the biggest question mark. Non– roster invitee Alex Cole seems to be the front–runner for the opening day start, but will share time with raw talent Dwayne Hosey.

Dan Duquette has done a masterful job in providing insurance in the outfield, signing former Detroit Tiger speedball Milt Cuyler to a minor league contract and inviting former All–Star Felix Jose and young slugger Phil Clark to Fort Myers.

This outfield log–jam has put youngster Troy O'Leary in a precarious position. O'Leary had a roller coaster of a season in 1995, improving in the field and weakening at the plate as the summer wore on. Now, it looks like the Milwaukee Brewer cast–off will rest both Canseco and Greenwell while his primary duty may be as the designated hitter.

The pitching, if all stay healthy and that is a huge "if", can be one of the better staffs, top to bottom, in the American League.

Roger Clemens showed up to camp in decent baseball shape, and since he is on the last year of his contract, we should see some vintage Rocket in 1996.

Aaron Sele did the smart thing in completely resting his arm last season and should come back strong. Tim Wakefield could be solid, having less pressure being the third starter. Tom Gordon finally gets to pitch for a team whose primary power source isn't 76–year old Gary Gaetti. The fifth slot in the rotation is still up in the air, but will most likely be filled by ex–Montreal lefty Butch Henry or 22–year old Sox super–prospect Jeff Suppan.

The bullpen will be just as good, if not better than the first five. Duquette has hoarded veteran role–pitchers to stabilize the staff, led by Heathcliff Slocumb, Stan Belinda, and port–sider Mike Stanton.

Catching these pitchers will be the duty of ex–lovechild(1) Yankee, Mike Stanley. Stanley, a dead pull–hitter will thrive with the wall and will round out one heckuva batting order. 1. Cole, 2. Valentin, 3. Vaughn, 4. Canseco, 5. Greenwell, 6. Stanley, 7. Cordero, 8. O'Leary, 9. Nachring.

So, say what you want about the Sox, but it looks to me like there's no reason for them to not be one of the best teams in baseball this season.

• Why won't the Yankees sign Darryl Strawberry? Hasn't he done enough drugs to fulfill the team requirements? Dwight Gooden and Steve Howe have. Gooden wanted to wear number 12 to represent his success in his 12–step program — Wade Boggs wouldn't give it up. Too bad.

But, with the return of Jimmy Key, the signing of Dave Cone and a revamped lineup, including Mariano Duncan and Tino Martinez, Joe Torre's cartel should contend in 1996.

• Tinker to Evers to Chance. Ever heard of them? These three Chicago Cub HoFers are probably the most famous double play combination in all of baseball lore.

In signing superstar Roberto Alomar, the Baltimore Orioles have assembled a trio that could become more famous. Ripken to Alomar to Palmeiro. It doesn't have the same ring, but they have a chance to lead the Orioles deep into October. Everybody knows about Alomar and Cal Ripken, but Rafael Palmeiro doesn't get enough credit for being maybe the best all–around first baseman in the junior circuit.

The Orioles have an advantage over the Cubbies of the early 1900's: they have a big–name third baseman in Bobby Bonilla, and if he doesn't feel like playing third, B.J. Surhoff can play anywhere. The Cubs also never had pitchers like Mike Mussina and Randy Myers.

Look out for the American League East.

• So, it's about time that Dick Vitale acknowledges the dominance of the undefeated UMass men's basketball team. All season he has sung the praises of Ray Allen and the Huskies of UConn and Rick Pitino's Wildcats as the two best teams in college hoops. Somebody's in denial.

The Minutemen (25–0) destroyed Kentucky, the pre–season number one, in their first game of the season, and Connecticut recently got hammered by the on–again, off– again Georgetown Hoyas.

Sure, UConn (24–2) and Kentucky (22–1) can both go eight or nine deep, but neither team is undefeated, nor have they played quite as competitive an out–of–conference schedule as the Minutemen. Jim Calhoun continues to pile on the cream puffs outside the tough Big East: Fairfield, Hartford, Central Connecticut, Northeastern, give me a break. Kentucky is talented, but the SEC is not the basketball conference it was a couple of years ago.

UMass has three games in its path before a perfect regular season (knock on wood, hard!), and there's no room on the band wagon for Dicky V.

• Sticking with the hardwood theme, M.L. Carr has got to go. The Celtics are not a great team, by any means...starting point guard, David Wesley?!? On the other hand, they are not as bad as their sixth place standing in the Atlantic Division.

There is a solid core in Dino (should have been an All– Star) Radja, Rick Fox, Greg Minor and Eric Williams, but Carr just can't coach. He can't be a general manager either. Ninth pick in the draft...hmm...we'll take Eric (I'm seven feet tall and I can barely dunk) Montross. The Celtics didn't need athletic talent like Eddie Jones or Wesley Person's outside touch (sarcasm).

Dominique Wilkins and Pervis Ellison were brilliant free agent signings (more sarcasm), and Dana Barros is making too much money for 12.5 points a game. Williams, the one good thing in the Carr era, wasn't even really M.L.'s choice. Larry Bird pushed hard for the swingman from Providence, otherwise we could have been stuck with Duke's legendary Erik Meek.

Speaking of legends, I think it's about time #33 came back to the parquet. We could use him.

the Friars could be more fatigued, while the Minutemen, idle tonight, should be firing on all cylinders.

One player who has been hot of late for UMass is Rob Bonneau, who tied the all–time UMass record for assists in a season this past weekend, notching his 28th of the year. Bonneau, who also leads the team with 44 points, ranks fourth in Hockey East in that department. The junior has at least one point in 11 of his last 13 games and has scored five goals in his five career games against PC.

Minutemen Notes: Regardless of who scores, UMass is a better team when it scores first and often. The Minutemen are 7–2–2 when notching the game's first goal and 7–0–2 when holding the lead after one period. Trailing after one, UMass is just 1–11–2... After being the league's only team last year not to involved in a shootout, UMass has set Hockey East records by having three in a row and also by winning all of them...The UMass power play has gone 5–for–16 in its last three games, a vast improvement from last year's dreadful clip.

Trade sends Rooks, Laettner to Hawks

(AP) — The Atlanta Hawks yesterday traded veteran guard Spud Webb and center Andrew Lang to the Minnesota Timberwolves for center-forward Christian Laettner and center Sean Rooks.

The Timberwolves, who have won only 15 games this season, got rid of two disgruntled players. Rooks, who started 70 games last season for Minnesota, had asked for a trade, and Laettner had displeased his teammates and coaches by feuding with 19-year-old rookie Kevin Garnett.

Laettner, a 6-foot-11, 235-pounder, was a first-round draft pick — the third pick overall — by the Timberwolves out of Duke in 1992 but never lived up to expectations in Minnesota. Switched from the forward position to center this season, he has averaged 18 points and 6.9 rebounds in 44 games.

"That's fine," Laettner said when asked about the trade. "Now I've got to go and do what you do in the NBA if you get traded, and that's go to your new team and play as well as you can."

Rooks, a 6-10, 250-pounder, was traded to the Timberwolves in November 1994 by the Dallas Mavericks. A second-round pick out of Arizona in the '94 draft, he has averaged 6.8 points in 49 games. Hawks general manager Pete Babcock, whose team is 28-23 and fourth in the Central Division, said the trade would make Atlanta "a bigger, younger team." Lang is 29 years old and Webb 32. The 5-7 Webb is in his 11th NBA season and averaging 5.9 points off the bench. He played with the Hawks during the mid-1980s after signing as a free agent and returned to Atlanta last June in a trade with the Sacramento Kings.

Lang, a 6-11, 250-pounder, was averaging a career-high 12.9 points and 6.5 rebounds for Atlanta. Signed by the Hawks as a free agent in 1993, he originally was drafted by Phoenix in 1988. Wolves vice president of basketball operations Kevin McHale said the trade was made partly to improve his team's chemistry. Garnett's emergence as an offensive player - he has double-doubles in points and rebounds the last three games - made Laettner expendable, McHale said.

"Everybody's got to understand there's roles that need to be played in the context of the team," he said. "If people don't accept that or don't understand that, it ends up being (conflict) all the time."

McHale said more significant factors for the deal were the physical presence he hopes Lang will bring and the salary cap flexibility Webb provides.

Webb is in the final year of his contract; Lang is signed through 1999. The Wolves play host to Atlanta on Sunday.

down 6.8 rpg. Mathews is currently averaging 8.0 ppg and 5.0 rpg. Waltman and Mathews have also each recorded three double–doubles on the year.

Guards Genevieve Lukenda and Kelly Peterson and also consistent for the Bonnies, 7.5 and 4.3 ppg, respectively.

In the season's first matchup between the two teams, at the William D. Mullins Center, Massachusetts sent the Bonnies packing with a 79–65 win. Carroll was again the force for the Minutewomen, carrying UMass with 26 points and nine boards. Tricia Pawling led the way for St. Bonaventure, scoring 19. Mathews wiped the glass for the opponent, grabbing six rebounds.

Massachusetts will return home to play its final home game of the season against Rhode Island, Tuesday at 7 p.m.

Warren Moon acquitted of assaulting his wife

(AP) — A jury deliberated only 27 minutes before deciding today that Minnesota Vikings quarterback Warren Moon didn't assault his wife during an argument last summer.

Prosecutors pursued the misdemeanor assault case despite the opposition of Felicia Moon, who was forced to testify against her husband under a new Texas law and told the jury she had started the fight in July 1995.

When the verdict by the four woman, two-man jury was announced, Mrs. Moon and her supporters jumped to their feet, raised their hands and cheered.

As the judge polled jurors to ensure their decision was unanimous, Mrs. Moon looked up and mouthed, "Thank you. Thank you." She embraced her husband.

Conviction on the misdemeanor assault charge could have gotten her 39-year-old husband a year in jail and a $4,000 fine.

Jurors reached their verdict after defense attorney Rusty Hardin said in closing arguments that prosecutors had no evidence that Moon beat his wife.

Moon testified she kneed him in the groin and that they wrestled to the floor as he tried to keep the dispute confined to a bedroom. He didn't want their son Jeffrey, who was elsewhere in the house, to witness the fight.

By the time it was over, however, a scratched and bruised Mrs. Moon had fled the house in her car, her husband in pursuit, and Jeffrey had told a 911 operator that he feared his father was going to beat his mother.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 - April 19) — A spontaneous gathering could take place today. Someone reacts favorably to a business proposition or loan request. Influential people give you their support.

TAURUS (April 20 - May 20) — Today could mark a turning point where your prestige is concerned. Reach out to people who share your commitment to excellence. A well- thought out plan will succeed.

GEMINI (May 21 - June 20) — Creative ideas and clever financial moves dominate the morning hours. Your generosity is admirable but can be carried too far. Be skeptical if approached by someone with an incredible sob story.

CANCER (June 21 - July 22) — Unspoken fears can keep you from trying new things. Break free from the shackles of self-doubt. Romance takes on a rosy glow tonight. Perhaps you are ready to make a commitment? Be affectionate.

LEO (July 23 - Aug. 22) — Getting better organized will ensure that your day runs smoothly. To avoid criticism, follow the rules set up by headquarters. Disobey them at your own risk.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 - Sept. 22) — Your popularity rises. Others like the fact that you don't take yourself too seriously. Explore a link between science and music. One- on-one relationships are favored tonight.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 - Oct. 22) — A wonderful day for those in the fine arts. Invite an old chum to lunch. Sign contracts only after reading the fine print. If planning a night on the town, choose your companions carefully.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 - Nov. 21) — Emphasize your passionate side without going overboard. Strong family bonds will aid your career efforts. Your words of encouragement will help a friend who is under considerable pressure.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 - Dec. 21) — Someone promises a big return on an investment. Give serious thought to ending a relationship that is going nowhere. You do have other options.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 - Jan. 19) — An excellent day for socializing, traveling and making introductions. A pet project could become a reality if you persuade someone influential to back you. Take advantage of a golden moment! Ask for an endorsement.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 - Feb. 18) — A long-cherished dream can come true if you work hard. Count your blessings! Entertaining co-workers at home could create good will. Clear up paperwork before leaving the office. A strategic retreat improves a dicey situation.

PISCES (Feb. 19 - March 20) — Dissatisfaction on the job could spring from unrealistic expectations. Be realistic. A timely concession could persuade someone to join forces with you. A long-sought accord will be reached when you agree to compromise.

Revenge of home loss on the minds of Minutemen

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Last season, the George Washington Colonials ended two extended winning streaks of the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

The first came at the Charles E. Smith Center where GW knocked off the top-ranked Minutemen and end their program-record 16 game winning streak. Ten days later, UMass' on campus winning streak of 42, which at the time was the nation's longest, came to a screeching halt with the 80-78 Colonial win.

This will be the first meeting between the two teams after the first season-sweep of UMass, since Temple did it in 1991. With an excellent chance to make the NCAA tournament, coach Mike Jarvis and his team are anxious to get in on with the Minutemen.

"It's great, we've got the No. 1 team in the league and have a chance to play them in their building," the Colonials' coach said. "I know we'll certainly be ready for UMass. I think we've won there twice although we only have one on record. I think that will give us more motivation tomorrow [being the only team to win at the Mullins Center]."

Last year's sweep by GW has not been lost on the Minutemen.

"We just remember when we lost to them both times," senior co-captain Dana Dingle said. "We are looking forward to the game, and playing how we've been playing all year. That's playing UMass basketball and hopefully we'll be successful."

That's exactly how the Minutemen have been during this 26-0 run (14-0 in the Atlantic 10), which once again was put in jeopardy Tuesday night before UMass pulled out a 74-69 win over Rhode Island.

The Colonials (17-5 overall, 10-2 A-10) are currently tied for first place, along with Virginia Tech, in the West Division and are led by the Kwame Evans (21 points per game in conference play) and Alexander Koul (eight rebounds a game).

It would be easy to call this a revenge game, but the Minutemen are not dwelling on last year's loss at home.

"Everyone's just looking at it as another game," Dingle said. "We're just taking things one game at a time and this just happens to be the next game on our schedule."

If UMass is to get revenge from last year's loss, they will have to control the streaky Evans who has led the Colonials in scoring 12 times already this season. It was his all-around play that was the main reason the Minutemen are no longer perfect in the Mullins Center. In the two games, Evans averaged 28 points and eight rebounds.

Jarvis knows no matter what, the Minutemen will be gunning for his squad and to pull off a win two years in a row in Amherst, his team will be need to be up for the challenge.

"I expect those kids to go up there and play all out, tomorrow," Jarvis said. "It's a great opportunity, we're looking forward to the opportunity and the challenge because UMass is a great team."

Hockey East homestretch lurking ahead for UMass

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Although the Massachusetts hockey team has already clinched a berth in the Hockey East playoffs, if it intends to catch New Hampshire and not be forced to play at defending national champion Boston University in the opening round, the team will have to follow a rocky road.

A sport utility vehicle will be needed to navigate the Minutemen through a bumpy stretch drive, which continues tomorrow night with a visit by the fourth best team in Hockey East, Providence College (16-13-2, 11-8-2 HE).

The game will be played at 8 p.m., as opposed to the customary 7 p.m. starting time, to allow for the William D. Mullins Center crew to change over the arena from the men's basketball game.

With just three games remaining, the Minutemen (10-16-4, 4-13-4) need to make up an eight point gap in the standings, all against teams that UMass has played tightly, but has yet to defeat this year.

UMass badly outshot the Friars and their vaunted neutral- zone trap in two games earlier this season, but came out of the weekend series with no points, falling 7-5 and 4-1.

The Friars started out the season on a hot streak, as did the Minutemen, who rode into Schneider Arena neck and neck with PC, behind BU, in November.

The Minutemen were able to accomplish many team goals in those games, but some ill-timed penalties and superb goaltending by Dan Dennis foiled their upset bids.

Dennis continues to be a mainstay in the Friar net, logging over 88 percent of the minutes there this season, and starting every Hockey East game.

As a team though, the Friars have fallen from their lofty perch into a more reasonable one. Coming off an 8-1 shellacking at the hands of BU Friday night, PC has to regroup if it is to hold off Boston College for the final home ice spot in the first round. With a solid stretch run, PC could even catch Maine and finish third in the conference, tying the school's best-ever league finish.

PC will start this drive tonight when they host UNH, something that might give UMass an advantage as

UMass tries for three-in-a-row on road

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will look to bring home a perfect record from its three-game road trip when the Minutewomen take on St. Bonaventure in Olean, NY, Saturday.

The Minutewomen will be wrapping up a westward swing, having traveled to face three Atlantic 10 opponents. In the first game of the trip, the Minutewomen squared off against Fordham, and held the Lady Rams to only 34 points, soundly spelling defeat for Fordham, 62-34.

The UMass squad then travelled to Dayton to take on the Flyers. Behind a 55 percent shooting performance from the field, the Minutewomen cruised to their sixth straight victory, 65-53.

The driving force behind the team's recent success has been Crystal Carroll. Against Fordham, Carroll logged 18 points and pulled down six rebounds. At Dayton, Carroll led all scorers with 19 points, including 11 second half buckets. In addition, she grabbed seven rebounds and recorded a block.

At Fordham, Melissa Gurile recorded her fifth double- double of the season, scoring 18 and tallying 11 boards. Against Dayton, Beth Kuzmeski stepped up to back up Carroll, chipping in 14 points and grabbing 11 rebounds. The total was Kuzmeski's first double-double of the season.

Octavia Thomas has been solid in the Massachusetts road effort, scoring 10 in New York and nine in Ohio. Thomas recorded three steals against Fordham and a pair of take- aways at Dayton.

St. Bonaventure will be led by center Lisa Vizzoca. The senior is averaging 10.8 points per game and 5.1 rebounds per game. She has recorded double figure point totals in 11 games this season, despite only going to the free throw line 19 times on the year.

Vizzoca will be backed by forwards Hilary Waltman and Kelly Mathews. Waltman, only a freshman, is posting impressive numbers in the scoring category, with 13.7 ppg. She also pulls

Men's gym heads to 'Cuse

The No. 5 Massachusetts men's gymnastics team competed last weekend in a tri-meet held in West Point, NY. The Minutemen defeated the University of Washington, 217.250-188.650, but fell to host Army, 219.450-217.250.

UMass was led by junior Ruslan Shupak, who tied for first place on the still rings with a score of 9.600, and took second on the vault with a 9.200.

Phil Lieberman finished second on the high bar with a 9.400. Gabe Columbus scored a 9.550 to place second on the floor. Chris Voght finished third on the parallel bars with a 9.100.

On Tuesday, the UMass squad hosted Southern Connecticut State, and recorded its highest point total of the season in the 221.150-182.550 win.

Shupak and Columbus led the Minutemen, taking two first place finishes apiece. Shupak won the floor with a 9.725, and Columbus took the high bar with a 9.450. The duo tied for first on the vault with scores of 9.300.

Brad LeClair won the won the pommel horse with a score of 9.500.

Sox have a shot, Celtics don't, UMass clearly No. 1

Spring Training is here. I'm a baseball fanatic. Let's rock.

The Boston Red Sox are a perpetual source of early season optimism and late season discouragement. They start strong, taper off, make a post-All-Star break run, then fade away with the summer leaves.

There's something about this season though. The Sox may have found the right combination of pitching, hitting and speed to...(shh)...contend for the World Series title.

Around the Horn with Fred Hurlbrink Jr.

Granted, I personify the epitome of Red Sox optimism, but they have too much talent to not be a serious threat to the Cleveland Indians and the Atlanta Braves.

First of all, they have the reigning American League MVP, Mo Vaughn, whose new contract (3 years, $18.6 million) makes him the highest paid player in Red Sox history. Vaughn is the anchor of one of the strongest offensive infields in either league with Wil Cordero at second, John Valentin at shortstop and Tim Naehring playing the hot corner.

Clinton angered by Cuban attack

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration said Sunday that Cuba's downing of two small planes flown by Cuban-Americans was "a violation of the norms of civilized behavior" and called on the United Nations to discuss punitive actions.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher said the United States believes the planes were in international waters when they were shot down off the Cuban coast Saturday. He said President Clinton was considering a range of other options, which he did not identify, to show U.S. anger over the incident.

"The actions they took yesterday were not justified under any circumstances," Christopher said at a White House news conference. The attack brought Cuban-American relations to the forefront just two weeks before Florida's crucial presidential primary and GOP candidates and some in Congress sought to pressure the administration to impose tighter sanctions on the Fidel Castro government.

"Instead of siding with Castro in opposing tougher sanctions, President Clinton should now voice his support for tightening the Cuban embargo," said presidential candidate Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan).

Dole's rival for the nomination, Pat Buchanan, said American fighter planes should patrol international waters off Cuba. If Cuban planes attack planes in those waters, "I would shoot the Cuban planes down."

Congress last fall approved bills to moderately expand the 33-year-old trade embargo on Cuba. But the House and Senate remain divided on controversial new provisions included in the House bill but rejected by the Senate.

The downing of the planes "definitely changes the dynamics of what is going on," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla), a Cuban-American who represents a heavily Cuban district in Miami. She predicted that after the Cuban "act of terrorism" the tougher House version would prevail.

Among the options that the Clinton administration could consider were restoration of restrictions on financial, telephone and air links between the United States and Cuba.

Clinton eased some of those restrictions last fall, as well as permitting more travel to the island, to allow Cuban-Americans to contact their relatives in Cuba and provide them money.

Christopher said the White House's top foreign policy advisers met for three hours to discuss the incident and possible responses. Clinton was briefed afterwards on the session.

While declining to enumerate the possibilities, Christopher harshly condemned the attack, which he said was conducted "in broad daylight, on the instructions of Cuba's highest military authorities." He said the U.S. response would be "fully appropriate."

The only immediate action was instructing U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. Madeleine Albright to request an emergency meeting of the Security Council. He promised the United States would work with its international partners "to make clear that this violation will not go unanswered."

Cuba called the aircraft "pirate planes" and said they were shot down when they entered Cuban airspace and ignored warnings to leave.

The planes were chartered by the Brothers to the Rescue, a Florida-based Cuban-American group that flies over the straits between Florida and Cuba to look for Cubans escaping their island by sea.

U.S.-Cuban relations go cold after air attack

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Just weeks ago, Cuban President Fidel Castro seemed to be reaching out to Washington. He released three political prisoners at the request of a U.S. congressman and made a major concession on a migration issue following American complaints.

But the long troubled relationship is now back on more familiar ground following the shooting down north of Cuba of two planes belonging to Miami exiles and Cuban charges that the United States was organizing dissident activity on the island.

In retrospect, it seemed just a matter of time before an incident such as the one that occurred Saturday would take place. As recently as Jan. 15, Cuba had warned that it would take "all necessary measures" to halt

AFSCME Union angered over hiring policy

Black tradesman questions University's stance on advancing minority workers

By Amy H. Paradysz
Collegian Staff

When a white woman from Food Services was selected to fill a Housing Services painter's position, union workers said the job should have been given to a minority of color.

The position was targeted for a woman or minority by the Affirmative Action office.

This "shows the extent they'll go to keep a person of skin color out of the position by filling it with a white woman," said James Pennington, a black tradesman from Housing Services who applied for the job.

Gloria Ortiz of the Affirmative Action office said the AFSCME Union contract has a clause which "allows the University to target the position for under-represented groups." Currently, the federal government considers women and minorities to be under-represened, according to Ortiz.

When a position is targeted, a candidate may be selected from outside the administrative group.

Pennington said, "The problem we're having here is Housing Services refuses to give any minority of skin color... a skilled tradesmen" position.

He requested a meeting with John Czabaj, assistant operations manger for Housing Services, to discuss the reasons for his non-selection. "This was not granted because he was less senior than the person who got the job," according to a memorandum from M. Christine Nelson, assistant employee/labor relations administrator.

According to David Mitchell, president of the American Federation of State and County Municipal Employees (AFSCME) Union, "David Barrios had more seniority than the female they gave the job to."

Barrios, who is Hispanic, said he has been with Housing Services for about five years.

"They had an opportunity to hire a person of color in skilled trades, and didn't do it," Mitchell said. "Everyone who has advanced has had to fight tooth and nail."

As of March 1993, there was one black worker out of 43 in construction trades, and no Hispanics within the executive area of Student Affairs.

There is one other black tradesworker who is "not interested in moving up," according to Pennington, who said there are few minorities of color "even in low-skill jobs." He said there was one black male working in south Southwest Residential Area and one black female in north Southwest, both cleaning.

"In Housing it's mandatory that any employee hired go to diversity traning," said Pennington, "then they turn right around and keep you down."

A white male was hired as a temporary painter, and he's going to be trained, according to Pennington. "It goes to show you [that] if they want you, what they'll go to get you," Pennington said.

Barrios and Pennington work as general laborers, as opposed to skilled tradesmen, such as plumbers, electricians, carpenters and painters. Both men expressed hopes of moving up to skilled trades positions.

"Maybe this woman is qualified, but there was no testing of anyone's qualifications," Pennington said.

According to the memo from Nelson, "...the 14 on- campus applicants from the targeted pool were reviewed and eight applicants were selected for interviews. Czabaj, who Interviewed the candidates, said he questioned each about painting experience and his or her knowledge of painting tools and materials.

"Czabaj said that Pennington had some painting experience, but that his knowledge of paint products, brushes and finishes was limited. The successful candidate, with more than 10 years professional painting experience, was the best qualified. She also had four years more seniority than Pennington."

Yet, union members said the last three skilled trades positions were filled by white females, two as painters and one as a plumber. Three Housing Services workers said they think hiring should be done within the administrative unit.

"What we're looking at," Pennington said several times, "is cruelty to minorities."

He described several other situations which he considers to be evidence of racial discrimination. Pennington said that after he worked a seven hour shift in December, he was asked why he had put 20 miles on the University vehicle. He claims he spent that shift making trips from one building to another, but that the supervisor threatened to call the police.

When Pennington filed a grievance, he was told his grievance was invalid because the supervisor never followed through on his threat.

Pennington spoke of Chancellor David K. Scott, saying, "He's all for trying to get the University diversified for real. The middle management is stuck."

Olver challenges students to get involved and vote

By Anastasia Kudrez
Collegian Staff

Young Americans feel alienated from politics, according to Congressman John W. Olver, who said the declining number of voters proves it.

In a discussion titled, "Student Activism and the Political Process," Congressman Olver (D-Amherst), challenged a group of 30 students to promote political activism among younger voters. The discussion, sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA), was held on Feb. 22 in the UMass Campus Center. Dan Rivera, Student Trustee, introduced Olver, praising his support of education and student financial aid.

"It's not the polemics or the sound bites, but the stuff in the middle," Rivera said.

John W. Olver

Olver, 59, has been a U.S. Representative for the First Congressional District since 1991, replacing the late Republican Silvio Conte. He opened the discussion with a general explanation of the decreasing involvement of younger voters in the democratic process.

Reminiscing back to the 1960s when he taught chemistry at UMass, Olver used the chalkboard to illustrate the polarization of the parties. His diagram showed that the majority of politically active Republicans and Democrats have moved to the extreme ends of the political spectrum. Olver said this polarization has alienated moderates from both parties.

"The center has fallen out," he said.

Olver criticized the effects of electronic media. The visual images of television are much stronger than print media, but much shorter. He argued that this disjointed view of politics has decreased people's involvement in the democratic process. As supporting evidence, Olver referred to the New Hampshire primary, in which only 14 percent of voters age 18 to 25 participated.

Olver discussed the controversial Buchanan campaign. He said that the extremist right wing views of Buchanan have divided the GOP. Buchanan appeals to the fears of Americans, especially job and economic insecurity.

"What Buchanan has formed is not a third party, but a collection of alienations come together," he said.

Olver called Buchanan's victory in N.H. "an earthquake," and criticized a position "openly isolationist, openly anti- gay, openly anti-abortion." He also pointed out the "interesting overtones" of white supremicism and anti-Semitism associated with Buchanan.

Olver decried the concept of protection within isolationism. He said the Republicans are not working to solve the problems that cause concern among Americans, but proposing broad budget cuts. He said minimum wage, mandatory pensions, student financial aid, health care and insurance during unemployment are issues that have been marginalized.

Before he opened the discussion to the group, Olver listed what he believes are key issues for the electorate, young people in particular — access to education, the future of jobs and environmental protection.

The majority of students agreed with Olver's premise that young voters feel alienated from the democratic process. Rivera told him, "People think individual votes are not really important."

Ashavan Doyon, political chair of the LBGA, chair of the University Policy Committee and an SGA senator, said that many people in the gay community feel politically apathetic. Doyon attributed this apathy to disappointment in President Clinton's lack of progress toward GLB rights.

Olver, who supports GLB rights, defended Clinton as "having his hands tied," and warned Doyon that "if the gay community decides not to participate, then demagogues will get into office."

David Weaver, the Southwest senator-at-large, told Olver that UMass students seem to oppose student government as well. "I can't tell you why, but students are anti-SGA on campus," he said.

Olver's discussion came three days after his Congressional seat was challenged by State Senator Jane M. Swift (R- North Adams). A social moderate, Swift supports abortion rights and gay rights, but so far she has stressed fiscal conservatism in her campaign. Swift, 30, has been a senator since 1990. She has the support of Gov. William F. Weld and her Beacon Hill GOP colleagues.

Olver closed the discussion by thanking the audience and encouraging them to influence others to vote.

"I think it's exceptionally important to find out what will motivate young people to take part in the political process," he said. "They will feel alienated otherwise."

flights over the island by U.S.-based groups opposed to Castro, including shooting them down.

The warning was prompted by flights on Jan. 9 and Jan. 13 by U.S.-based pilots who tossed out hundreds of thousands of leaflets with anti-Castro messages.

In Saturday's incident, four people were aboard the two small aircraft that were shot down by fighter planes off Cuba's coast. The Cuban Foreign Ministry had said the planes were within eight miles of the coast, well within Cuban air space. But the flights' sponsors insisted the planes were in international air space.

There is little question now that the incident has neutralized the slight progress that has been made recently. Cuba felt it had to act on the repeated warnings it had issued — President Clinton, in contrast, believes the Cuban action was far out of proportion to the provocation. It remains to be seen how the attack will affect the dealings of the two countries on migration and other issues. The administration's first action Sunday was to call for a meeting of the United Nations Security Council to discuss punitive actions.

The attack also occurred at a time when the interest of American companies in learning about the foreign investment climate had been increasing dramatically. In January alone, 60 U.S. firms sent representatives to Cuba, a four-fold increase compared with two years ago, according to Cuban officials. The firms are apparently intent on keeping informed in the event the U.S. embargo is lifted or at least loosened.

On Feb. 10, following appeals from Rep. Bill Richardson (D-N.M.) Castro released three political prisoners. Earlier, Richardson had won a commitment from Castro to cut in half the $600 exit fee Cuba charges for some — but not all — of the Cubans who receive U.S. immigration visas. The State Department had called the $600 fee exorbitant.

Castro recently commented on the slight advance in U.S.-Cuban relations but those remarks obviously are no longer relevant. Just two days before the attack, the Cuban Foreign Ministry spokeswoman had accused the United States of organizing and financing the formation of a coalition of 131 dissident groups on the island. On Friday, the State Department labeled the allegation "preposterous." Days earlier, the administration condemned a wave of arrests Cuba had begun at mid-month of coalition leaders. The crackdown left no doubt of Castro's determination to give no political space to his political opponents. And with Washington insisting on such an opening as the price for a more normal relationship, the prospect is for continued stalemate — a situation reinforced by the incident Saturday in the Florida straits.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

RECENTLY, MORNINGSTAR CALLED US CHEAP. IT'S NOT EVERY DAY YOU GET A COMPLIMENT LIKE THAT.

All financial companies charge operating fees and expenses—some more than others. Of course, the lower the expenses you pay, the better. That way more of your money goes where it should—towards building a comfortable future.

We make low expenses a high priority.

Because of our size and our exclusive focus on serving the needs of educational and research communities, TIAA-CREF's costs are among the lowest in the insurance and mutual fund industries.

In fact, Morningstar, Inc.—one of the nation's leading sources of variable annuity and mutual fund information—says, "CREF's size...enables it to realize a remarkable economy of scale."[1] According to Morningstar's data, CREF's "minuscule" 0.33% average fund expense charge was less than half that charged by comparable funds.[2]

The TIAA Traditional Annuity also charges no fees aside from a very modest operating expense of 1/4 of 1% of annuity assets. Interest and dividends are reported after all operating costs have been deducted. Standard & Poor's calls TIAA's costs "exceptionally low."[3]

Of course, expenses are only one factor to consider when you make an investment decision. While we're committed to keeping our expenses down, we spare nothing in striving to provide top-quality investment choices, financial expertise, and personal service. Because that can make a difference in the long run, too.

TIAA-CREF seeks performance, not profit.

At TIAA-CREF, we believe people would like to spend more on retirement, not on their retirement company. If you'd like to see how our approach can help keep more of your money working for you, call us at 1 800 842-2776 (8 a.m. to 11 p.m. ET, weekdays). We'd consider it a compliment.

Actress explores life of Sojourner Truth

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

A former slave who became an abolitionist and activist for women's rights, Sojourner Truth, was brought to life in the Campus Center Auditorium Thursday in Ain't I a Woman? Story of Sojourner Truth.

Truth was depicted by Anike, a "one woman show" from New York. She began the performance by telling the audience that "this is a story about bein' free and bein' enslaved."

The real-life Sojourner Truth was born in 1797 in New York City, with the name Isabella. Married at the age of 13, Truth was told to "do my business," the business of making babies. She was enslaved for 16 years of her life, and stated "legally I had been bought and sold, but inside I knew I was free."

Truth eventually did gain her freedom when slavery became illegal in New York. She decided to travel east, but before she did, she "asked the Lord for a name." The name he gave her was the name that became synonymous with the nineteenth century women's movement.

Truth traveled from Connecticut to Massachusetts speaking at meetings. She was among the participants at the first National Convention on Women's Rights in Worcester.

Her presence at the Convention "symbolized black women's solidarity with the new cause. [Women] aspired to be free not only from racist oppression but also from sexist domination" according to Angela Davis, author of Women, Race, and Class.

In 1851 Truth made her famous "Ain't I a Woman" speech at the women's convention in Akron, Ohio. After two days of sitting listening to men oppose women's right to vote because "they could not even walk over a puddle without the help of a man," she arose to refute their logic.

With a thunderous voice speaking straight from experience, Truth pointed out that she had never been helped over mud puddles, and asked "Ain't I a Woman?"

"I have ploughed, and planted, and gathered into barns and no man could head me," Truth said. "And ain't I a woman? I could work as much and eat as much as a man — when I could get it — and bear the lash as well! And ain't I a woman? I have borne 13 children and seen them most all sold into slavery, and when I cried out with my mother's grief, none but Jesus heard me! And ain't I a woman?"

Truth "refuted the idea of male supremacy as a Christian principle" according to Davis.

"That little man in black there, he says women can't have as much rights as men, because Christ wasn't a woman. Where did Christ come from? From God and a woman," Truth said. "Man had nothing to do with him."

Until her death at age 86, Sojourner continued to work for equality for women and blacks. She even met with Abraham Lincoln to abolish the "Jim Crow cars" where blacks and whites were seated separately.

Anike, who portrayed Truth, is a 25-year-old actress originally from Newton. She is currently taking the piece around the Boston area and intends to perform it for for high school students.

Anike has been performing Ain't I a Woman? since 1991 and has received an enormously positive response. Her next project will be a combination of 12 different characters based on corporate interviews.

Thursday's performance was sponsored by The Office of ALANA Affairs, in conjunction with the Women's Studies Program, Commuter Area Government, Women of Color Program and New World Theater.

Sen. Rosenburg honored for new position

By Liz Anderson
Collegian Correspondent

On Friday, the University of Massachusetts celebrated the recent appointment of alumnus Sen. Stan Rosenburg as the chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee in the Massachusetts Senate.

Rosenburg is the first western Massachusetts legislator to be appointed chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee. He was appointed on Jan. 8, after serving one year as chairman of the Banks and Banking Committee.

The ceremony began at Memorial Hall 4 p.m. with an array of refreshments and a performance by the UMass jazz quartet. State and county representatives, faculty members, students and alumni lined up to greet the senator.

Chancellor David K. Scott, along with five local and state government representatives, made speeches acknowledging Rosenburg's accomplishments. Each of the speakers stressed the importance of the senator's public education and his ties to the numerous small towns that make up western Massachusetts.

"Senator Rosenburg is exactly the kind of person who should be chairman of the Senate Ways and Mean Committee," said state Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst). "He is smart, honest and a hard worker. He is well respected in the State House. Most of the Senators are from Boston and private educations. Sen. Rosenburg lives in Amherst and went to a public university."

While presenting Rosenburg with an aerial photograph of the University, Scott expressed his confidence in the senator's future representation of UMass at the state's annual budget negotiation.

"Sen. Rosenburg is very instrumental in bringing the kind of library worthy of W.E.B. DuBois' name to the University of Massachusetts," said Scott.

In a speech thanking his supporters and praising the University, Rosenburg encouraged students to get involved in the student government and vote. The senator said he especially appreciated the insightful questions and comments he received from students while teaching a class earlier in the day.

Rosenburg blamed cutbacks in state funding on competition between many state institutions over very little money. Yet, he expressed excitement when he projected the future of the UMass, and assured his audience that he will do everything in his power to increase state funding.

"With support and friendship provided, I will do the job to the best of my ability," Rosenburg said. "Together we will make progress."

Rosenburg is a 1977 graduate of the UMass. He also worked at the University for eight years, first as director of the Arts Extension Service and then as director of the Community Development and Human Services Programs in the Division of Continuing Education.

"Being an alumni, Sen. Rosenburg knows life on campus and has connections, not only throughout the state government but throughout the university as well. So when it comes time to vote for the budget, he has what it takes to get the support that UMass needs," said Derick Cheeseboro- Weaver, secretary of public policy and relations for the Student Government Association.

In addition to his duties as Ways and Means chairman, Rosenburg serves on the Senate Rules and State Administration committees. He continues to serve on the Senate's Special Commission on Telecommunications and Technology, and as a member of the Foster Kids Caucus. He is active in welfare and social services reform and a number of recycling development and education financing initiatives.

"Stan Rosenburg becoming the Chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee is one of many stars aligning for UMass, creating a constellation in higher education," said Student Trustee Dan Rivera.

A presidential nightmare

Matthew Wurtzel

On Tuesday Pat Buchanan won the New Hampshire primary vaulting him to the front of the Republican presidential race with about 28 delegate votes versus Bob Dole's 16 and Lamar Alexander's nine.

After watching the late news, I went to bed. That night I had a hellish nightmare of what the next four years would be like if Buchanan won the presidency. My dream also included a Republican victory in the House of Representatives.

Buchanan's first action as president was to ask the Republican Congress to repeal the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) which resulted in a recession because businesses cut investment. Congress complied with his request and began proceedings to repeal the accords with our neighbors, despite business' protests.

As our economy went sour, so did the economies of nations with close ties to us such as Canada, Japan and the European Community. Meanwhile, the repeal of NAFTA left the Mexican economy in flux, and led to a civil war which caused flows of immigrants the likes of which border states had never seen before. These immigrants were unlike their predecessors because they were refugees seeking asylum under conventions established by the United Nations. However, Buchanan disregarded these conventions and prepared to round up the refugees to send them back to Mexico.

As Buchanan's second year began, the economy continued to slide as American multinational firms began to divest in the United States because Buchanan and Congress passed new strict "domestic production" laws which forbade companies from producing in other nations.

The flow of refugees from Mexico reached unprecedented amounts, so Buchanan sent troops south of the border. Following Buchanan's police action in Mexico, he went before Congress and asked them to officially declare war on Mexico. Despite public discontent over a war in Mexico, Congress followed Buchanan like sheep following their shepherd.

Buchanan attempted to play on sentiment of patriotism and nationalism which worked during the two World Wars to muster 20-year-olds to join the Armed Forces. However, Generation X did not take the bait. Like their hippie parents, they protested the war. Generation X was joined by the Baby Boomers in the November elections in 1988, electing practically a 100 percent Democratic Congress.

As the war in Mexico dragged on into December, terrorist activity increased through out the nation. Federal and state buildings became targets, and metal detectors were installed.

When Mexican terrorists switched their focus from government buildings to financial institutions, Congress began preparations to end the war, and began impeachment proceedings.

When the media announced Congress' intentions to impeach Buchanan, he promised to speak on television about the threats which plague our nation. In February 1999, Buchanan made history by temporarily nullifying the Constitution until the Mexican War ends, and disbanding Congress.

The public was stunned but immobile because Buchanan ordered troops to patrol the streets and enforce his rule. As Representatives were rounded up and placed under house arrest, politicians fled to Canada. Without Congress to keep him in check, Buchanan began even greater reforms in the name of the war effort. He institutionalized Christianity as the national religion, and outlawed the practice of other faiths. All college graduates were told to report to "case managers" at least once a month. Buchanan began preparing "homelands" near Native American Reservations for minorities and non-Christians.

Despite his efforts against the increased tide of terrorism, the number of bombings increased. When a terrorist was caught driving a truck bomb across the Canadian border into the United States, Buchanan demanded that Canada return ex-patriot leaders. The Canadian government did not comply, so he attempted to send troops into Southern Canada. Although the U.S. troops met little resistance from Canadian troops, Canada declared war and appealed to NATO and members of the former British Commonwealth for support.

Britain, Australia, France and Germany answered Canada's request by sending forces. The U.S. troops were forced back into the States, and for the first time since the War of 1812 foreign troops step foot on American soil. As northern border states were over run by allied forces, a German expeditionary force made a landing near Washington D.C. They stormed the city and faced little resistance. The troops took the White House, and descended into the president's underground bunker where they found the bodies of Buchanan and his wife — apparently suicides.

Upon seeing the bodies in my dream, I awoke in a cold sweat. I turned on the radio to listen to the news to reassure myself that what happened was just a dream. However, the announcer said Buchanan was now projected to win more primaries.

Flexing our political muscle

Stacy Shackford

One Sunday not so long ago (like two weeks ago), I trekked down the hill at a god-awful hour of the morning (around eight or nine) into the Campus Center to attend yet another board meeting. About 12 hours later I found myself trekking back up the hill with a new responsibility on my shoulders. I had just been elected as the National Student Representative for my organization. Within 48 hours I was flying to Washington D.C. for an extremely eventful six days in the capitol city.

Upon arriving in D.C., I was ordered to get into my Sunday's best and was whisked away to the National Press Club. The building was lushly carpeted complete with velvet furniture, tropical plants and chandeliers. We took a beautiful golden elevator up to the 11th floor and wandered around various displays complete with televisions and video recorders.

I met up with about five other students from across the country and we searched for the room in which we would be participating in a Youth Vote '96 press conference. On the way there we ran into many important people, none of whom we actually knew, but all of whom had that certain "I am superior to thou" air about them.

The press conference itself was an amazing experience. I was given a camera and, along with a woman from the Associated Press, was one of two photographers. The pressure was overwhelming. "Good Morning America," ABC News, C-SPAN, National Public Radio and various other newspeople were in attendance. Moreover, they saw us as the representatives of the entire generation and they were eager to know what we thought.

The next day I attended board meetings in the morning in a beautiful building next to the Supreme Court and across from the White House. In the middle of the meeting, a huge procession of cars drove slowly by with five limousines in the center. A window opened in the center limo and the president himself stuck his head out. A bunch of high school students, who were standing on the sidewalk, screamed in glee and snapped a few million pictures.

That afternoon we metro-ed over to the Department of Education and met Secretary Riley, who was very happy to receive us and sent us off with, "Now study hard boys and girls and do well in school." It was a rather interesting day, to say the least.

It paled in comparison, however, to Friday, Lobby Day, when I learned the most important lessons of my entire trip. I met with the staff of Massachusetts Congressmen Olver, Meehan and Torkildsen. The congressmen had already returned to their respective districts for the winter break so we couldn't meet with them in person. I was impressed that they were quite familiar with our organization and depended heavily on our research. They were also practically bending over backwards to become associated with us.

I felt the power that we as students had over the congressmen. I felt this the strongest when one of the congressmen, upon receiving an information packet, eagerly searched for the Youth Vote Scorecard — which last year indicated that he only voted about 60 percent on our side as far as environmental cutbacks and student rights were concerned — and asked, "Did we do better this year?" It occurred to me then that our grade really mattered, that he was pressured by it and was afraid of how we, as students, might vote for him and/or influence other voters.

When I think about what I learned in Washington D.C. last week, I remember the faces of the media eagerly asking us questions about "How does the youth of America feel about Buchanan? What are they main issues of concern? Are they as worried about the economy as their parents?" They didn't seem to know. There weren't enough studies or results from conclusive sources to tell them.

I also remember the power I had felt in that congressman's office. There I was, in D.C., a lowly student lobbying for a day, yet I seemed to hold an invisible thread connected to each of his gold cuff-links which I could easily pull one way or another. He was aware that even though I was a student, I was also a registered voter and a strong organizer and that this election year I could help make a difference in many ways that concerned him and his position.

Both of these lessons tie back to the same issue. First of all, the reason the media did not know how we, as students, feel about certain issues is because we don't get out there and vote and make our voices heard. Yet the congressmen knew, all the same, that there was a certain power to the student vote.

The reason I am even bothering to relate all this to you, as readers and as a part of this collective student voice and power, is that I feel the need to tap into this power that I just recently discovered. It's a fact that, disregarding any party ties one might have, if students go out in droves and vote, then politicians will be forced to take notice and address student issues. As Congressman Olver pointed out... even though only 14 percent — an embarrassing amount if you ask me — of people between the ages of 18 and 25 voted in the New Hampshire Primary, an exit poll indicated that the majority voted for Lamar Alexander, the third place candidate. So, assuming that if more youth showed up at the polls and voted even remotely along the same lines, the entire outcome of the elections would have changed dramatically.

Therefore, it is imperative that you get registered, educated and transported to the polls where you can make your voice heard loud and clear. I would also encourage everyone to start early and vote in the Mock Student Primary which will be taking place this week in the Student Union and in every dining hall during dinner. It is a nationwide effort including over 35 participating campuses in New England alone; the results of which will no doubt be closely examined by candidates and media alike. So get a head-start and participate in this great opportunity to represent your generation and make a positive influence on the course of the election process.

And for all the gods' sake...VOTE!

A "brief" explanation

Tara MK Connelly

Boxers or briefs?

This is a question posed to me many times and I have to say hands down — boxers. In fact, every woman I've asked has agreed that boxers are the underwear of choice.

But a friend of mine says differently. He insisted (and still does) that boxers are a Northeast coast thing. His words are (and I quote) that "women have been pre-dispositioned from birth here in the Northeast to think boxers are sexier."

Being lately from Miami, his conversations on the topic with Miami women always result with a "yea" for briefs. According to him, women down there think briefs are much more appealing — not just briefs, but those skimpy male counterparts to a woman's Victoria Secrets. He insists it's because in Miami, sex is a more open topic and sexuality is always in the air.

I guess one could suppose that Miami is a more sultry and sex conducive environment. But if that is so, then why do more women give birth in the fall, thus connotating that there is more sex in cold weather. But maybe he's right, maybe New England and New Englanders are more sexually repressed. I disagree. I just think that we are more reserved, but not necessarily repressed.

Sexy to me is a black turtleneck sweater vs. a lacy black bra. It's champagne and candles vs. sangria and incense. It's class vs. flash. It's the curve of a back, a glimpse of the collarbone, the shadow of a cheek bone and the back of the neck.

Sensuality is a thing to be savored and slowly revealed. What is sexy about something thrown in your face? For those of you who have seen Showgirls, after a while you became immune to the pairs of bouncing breasts and buttocks. It became just another thing — you blocked it off and try to focus on whatever measly plot they were trying to construct.

The human body is beautiful, but clothing can add a little excitement and anticipation. Anticipation seems to be lost to such a sex-filled society. Sex is something you do or have, not something to look forward to or savor. I'm positive that 99 percent of relationships get screwed up (metaphorically speaking) when the couple involved have sex. But abstinence is sexy and waiting heightens awareness and anticipation.

Boxers are the same way. Boxers are sexy because they are somewhat revealing (after all they are underwear), yet at the same time enticing. They don't blatantly display, uh, everything thus leaving a little to the imagination (and frankly ladies, sometimes imagination does wonders). Boxers are to me the sexiest thing about a man. Briefs on the other hand remind me of the Superfriends' Underoos collection. I see a pair and the theme to "Batman" starts buzzing through my head. I think of moms and those stupid Fruit of the Loom guys in those foam grape and banana costumes — I get scared.

Boxers or briefs, huh?

Maybe someday I'll do something utterly un-conservative and un-Northeast-ish and answer:

"Neither, I prefer nothing."

Letters to the Editor

French program necessary

To the Editor:

It is most unfortunate that the provost has communicated an interest in eliminating the French Department's Ph.D. program, one which is ranked 34th out of the top 100 programs in the country, for reasons which demonstrate her lack of understanding as to what a public university should be. While it seems almost foolish to have to defend the existence of such a program, it is perhaps necessary. In spite of the University's commitment to multiculturalism, we seem to be at the mercy of people who have little concern for any culture beyond the scope of a financial balance sheet. Which is not to say that their financial reasoning is sound. Au contraire.

Graduate programs that promote the study of foreign culture, languages, literature, art, philosophy, etc. are the prerequisites to a healthy nation in regards to both foreign and domestic interests. The burden which falls on the shoulders of both graduate and undergraduate students is to assert explicitly that we expect much more out of a university than a successful basketball program and a Polymer Science Dept., although we are certainly grateful for both.

Officers have more important duties

To the Editor:

Why on this campus is crime becoming uncontrollable (students are being physically attacked and shootings have occurred on more than one occasion in the last year) while my car is being towed? Last week, while many UMass students were enjoying a typical weekend night, two UMass police officers somehow found the time to sit and time how long my car was parked in a 15 minute loading zone spot. As three of my floormates witnessed, the tow truck was on the scene about ten minutes after I left my car, and my car was gone when I returned exactly 15 minutes later.

Although angered by the towing, our first reaction was of disbelief and disappointment with our police department. We do not claim to be law enforcement experts, but one would think that two officers would have higher priorities. Why not let the appropriated parking enforcement officials worry about ticketing and towing cars so that the police department can concentrate on more serious crime that occurs on this campus. It might just save someone's car from being stolen, a girl from being raped or even someone from being killed.

Dances evoke emotion

The Paul Taylor Dance Company gave a whimsical performance Thursday night.

PAUL TAYLOR DANCE COMPANY
Fine Arts Center
Feb. 22

The Paul Taylor Dance Company performed on Thursday night in front of an eager audience. The group offered scenes from their production Love and Madness, which were entitled "Roses," "Spindrift" and "Syzygy," all choreographed by legendary dancer, Paul Taylor.

The first piece, "Roses," showed the themes of love and adoration. A group of dancers used quiet, flowing and intricate steps while encircling a "warrior" and his object of devotion. At the same time, the performers used interesting gymnastics to twist their bodies into beautiful dimensions. Wagner's romantic orchestral piece, "Siegfried's Idyll," played in the background adding more tones of happiness and spring-like joyful emotion to the first act.

"Spindrift" was a very humorous piece centering the audience's attention upon a lonely man pondering his thoughts and memories by the sea. He was soon joined by several oceanic creatures who act strangely human, symbolizing how people tend to act like wild animals at times. The movements of this piece were fresh and energetic.

In several parts of the dance, a womanly creature ran elegantly across the stage, seeming to entice or tease the lonely man. He tried to catch her, and at times he did, but she always ended up escaping his embrace. It is possible that she could have resembled a love of his past that had left him, and he still had not lost touch with the memory of her.

Adding a celestial atmosphere to the performance, the Paul Taylor Dance Company concluded with "Syzygy" which used fantastic lighting designed by Jennifer Lipton and fast- driven sharp moves to further liven up the audience's spirit. Amongst the fluid and cosmic steps, there were hints of eroticism and smooth gestures, flowing to the rhythm of space-age music.

Designed by Santo Loquasto, the costumes, which were simply fashioned in white, black, gray, peach and olive only added to the graceful movements. At the same time, the designs made the audience focus their attention more upon the dancers themselves and the intricate steps they made.

The set, also designed by Loquasto, was basic as well but provided the right amount of effect to each piece. For "Spindrift," he created an aquamarine experience with a beach setting in the background. Loquasto also added to the celestial atmosphere of "Syzygy" with a fantastic star shooting behind the performers.

The Paul Taylor Dance Company exemplified true talent and was received by the audience with great enthusiasm.

Reed brings back his poetic ways

By Bradley Skaught
Collegian Correspondent

LOU REED
Set The Twilight Reeling
Warner Bros.

When Lou Reed released his brilliant comeback New York in 1989, it was heralded as the second coming of Rock and Roll's greatest street poet — a return to the raw, uncompromising stare he had once given the underground world of Andy Warhol's New York. Three albums later, Reed continues to deliver on that promise, growing and digging even deeper into his lyrical and musical powers to bring us Set The Twilight Reeling.

Abandoning the "concept" of structure he had applied to his last two albums (Magic and Loss and Songs For Drella), Reed is free to explore a wider variety of subject matters, most notably, his recent marital troubles and his romance with musician/performance artist Laurie Anderson. Reed tells his stories in the usual unflinching way, but there is some tenderness and vulnerability this time around.

On "Trade In," Reed undergoes a spiritual self- examination, "I want a trade in," he sings, "a 14th chance at this life." It is a dilemma he resolves in the breathtaking title track, "I accept the new found man and set the twilight reeling." There is no mystery as to what lies behind the transformation — "I met a woman with a thousand faces, and I want to make her my wife."

All is not concentrated on spiritual rebirth and discovery, however. "Riptide" finds Reed revisiting the personal turmoil and self-destruction he once explored in "Waves Of Fear" from his 1981 album The Blue Mask. "Egg Cream" is a deceptively frivolous childhood recollection that, ultimately, reflects upon the passage of time and the little things that are the building blocks of human experience. The most, intentionally shocking song on the album is "Sex With Your Parents Part II" — a humorous jab at right wing politics and a chance for Reed, in his usual bittersweet way, to make the listener think about things the listener would rather not think about.

"Hooky Wooky," the first single, is another humorous song that finds Reed fantasizing about meeting his lover's ex-boyfriends, "I wouldn't want to throw him off under the chemical sky, down into the street to die under the wheels of a car on Canal Street," he sings before singing joyfully, "I wanna hooky wooky with you!"

Lyrically, Twilight is the most expressive and mature work Reed has done yet. With Magic and Loss, Reed pushed the boundaries of Rock and Roll as poetry, incorporating a new expressionism and use of imagery into his work, which had previously been almost journalistic in its simplicity and focus. Twilight takes that development a step further with Reed quoting Shakespeare in "NYC Man" and paralleling the work of his former mentor, Delmore Schwartz, in lines such as, "First came fire, then came light, then came feeling, then came sight." Reed wraps each line in layers of meaning, revealing little truths with each careful twist of imagery.

Twilight does not stand on lyrics along, however — Reed has turned in one of the rawest and most exciting musical recordings he has made since The Blue Mask. Backed only by bass player Fernando Saunders and drummer Tony Smith, Reed recorded the entire album live in his New York apartment, "The Roof," handling all the guitar work himself. Reed's guitar work is surprising — never a technically fluent guitarist, he covers a wide stylistic spectrum with utmost competency.

On "NYC Man," Reed serves up Steve Cropper-like R&B fills, contrasting with the chaotic distortion fest of "Riptide." This stripped down approach may be perfectly suited for the blunt honesty of Reed's songwriting, but it isn't always able to carry the emotional weight of the song. "Riptide" peters out early, in desperate need of a second guitar, and "Sex With Your Parents II," too, suffers from the lack of guitars — a sound so effective on both New York and Magic and Loss.

The music may be most powerful, however, in its quiet moments. "Finish Line," dedicated to the late Sterling Morrison, recalls the sparseness of Dylan's best work, and "Hand On To Your Emotions" whispers beautifully over a lightly strummed guitar before crashing into a dramatic, distortion laden coda. The title track follows a similar pattern, closing the album with an explosive emotional release — one last exhortation of discovery and rebirth.

Set The Twilight Reeling is another solid entry in the Lou Reed catalog — a deeply personal album that reveals a brand new man pushing the limits of his own art and soul. Reed redefines a lot of the rules he invented in the first place, exploring the newfound possibilities of music and life through the power of his "Rock and Roll Heart." A

Multi–media show delights audience

ASSIMILATION
Bowker Auditorium
Feb. 24

Shirish Kurup, a self-declared Indo-African American, presented his one man show, Assimilation, at Bowker Auditorium Saturday night.

This version of the show, which according to Kurup had never been seen before, played in front of an audience of about 400.

The play began with a loud clacking sound as Kurup moved slowly across the stage, an illuminated shadow. When he finally began to speak, he was a child in his native India and his mother was telling him to put on powder before he went out to play. Finally, Kurup shook out a large quantity of powder onto his hands and slapped the substance onto his face and his hair.

The effect with the lighting and his wild, shoulder-length hair was ghostly. Kurup had the audience in stitches when he began to relate the Five Mythic Fears. Two of the five fears were every American was a streaker who had all smoked marijuana by age 12.

Kurup's ode to American life began with one of America's most known institutions, fast-food. After describing how chickens are slaughtered in India, Kurup said that he was happy to eat food — especially meat — with which he had not had a personal relationship.

At one point in the performance, Kurup told the audience his parents' names. Indian names can be long and unwieldy and it's especially rough when Indians immigrate to a new country and their names are invariably butchered. Kurup brought this to life when he hopped off the stage and made the audience repeat the names over and over. Then he asked for the crowd to recite the names in a round which eventually deteriorated.

The performance concluded with the story of a Thai woman and her daughter. When the little girl was naturalized, she asked the judge, "When do I get my blue eyes?" It was a profound note on which to end the piece.

After the play, Kurup and Page Leong, the director of the piece, sat down for an informal talk back. Kurup called the play a "nice introduction" to his other works, and when asked about the play's title, he replied that assimilation is "what is gained and what is lost." By moving from India to Africa to the United States, Kurup gained much but lost other things along the way.

About calling himself an Indo-African American, the artist said that he was born in India but his memories were from Africa. He commented that, "I think of myself as coming from all these places."

He also mentioned that sectionalism was dividing the country. "It's great," he said, because then people can find a place where they belong, but at the same time, he worries "about what happens when crossing over doesn't happen."

All in all, Assimilation was a charmingly funny piece, that captured intimately one man's voyage from India to Kenya and finally to America.

Sneed's poems discuss race & sexuality

BARRICADE AGAINST THE WIND
Hampden Theater
Feb. 22

Speaking fast and passionately, New York-based performer and writer, Pamela Sneed held the audience in a silent awe at Hampden theater last Thursday night.

Her monologue style poems are spoken in an intense stream of consciousness dealing with societal attitudes toward race and lesbianism. She also deals with her own problems, reconciling her connections to her race and culture because of the negative feelings they have towards her sexual orientation. Sneed says, "I consider myself black before I consider myself a lesbian."

Sneed, in one of her poems, says that she is "smiling when I'm seething...still" acknowledging her anger directed at her own race. Sneed cites in this poem that on the exterior, she is fine, yet on the inside she is "seething" because she is not accepted on the basis of her sexual orientation.

In "Mirror, Mirror" Sneed retreated to the back of the stage followed by a sole spotlight. This poem dealt with her frustration concerning societal expectations. She asks of the mirror on the wall to make her straight, white, thin, beautiful and "normal."

Throughout her performance Sneed used the audience as props to illustrate her point. When speaking of her adoptive parents she used an audience member to represent them, bestowing her affection on a surprised male.

During a question and answer period at the end of her performance Sneed explained, "I'm not interested in the best poet, I'm interested in who takes the most risk."

Women's B-ball tries for three–in–a–row on road

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will look to bring home a perfect record from its three–game road trip when the Minutewomen take on St. Bonaventure in Olean, NY, Saturday.

The Minutewomen will be wrapping up a westward swing, having traveled to face three Atlantic 10 opponents. In the first game of the trip, the Minutewomen squared off against Fordham, and held the Lady Rams to only 34 points, soundly spelling defeat for Fordham, 62–34.

The UMass squad then travelled to Dayton to take on the Flyers. Behind a 55 percent shooting performance from the field, the Minutewomen cruised to their sixth straight victory, 65–53.

The driving force behind the team's recent success has been Crystal Carroll. Against Fordham, Carroll logged 18 points and pulled down six rebounds. At Dayton, Carroll led all scorers with 19 points, including 11 second half buckets. In addition, she grabbed seven rebounds and recorded a block.

At Fordham, Melissa Gurile recorded her fifth double– double of the season, scoring 18 and tallying 11 boards. Against Dayton, Beth Kuzmeski stepped up to back up Carroll, chipping in 14 points and grabbing 11 rebounds. The total was Kuzmeski's first double–double of the season.

Octavia Thomas has been solid in the Massachusetts road effort, scoring 10 in New York and nine in Ohio. Thomas recorded three steals against Fordham and a pair of take–aways at Dayton.

St. Bonaventure will be led by center Lisa Vizzoca. The senior is averaging 10.8 points per game and 5.1 rebounds per game. She has recorded double figure point totals in 11 games this season, despite only going to the free throw line 19 times on the year.

Vizzoca will be backed by forwards Hilary Waltman and Kelly Mathews. Waltman, only a freshman, is posting impressive numbers in the scoring category, with 13.7 ppg. She also pulls down 6.8 rpg. Mathews is currently averaging 8.0 ppg and 5.0 rpg. Waltman and Mathews have also each recorded three double–doubles on the year.

Guards Genevieve Lukenda and Kelly Peterson and also consistent for the Bonnies, 7.5 and 4.3 ppg, respectively.

In the season's first matchup between the two teams, at the William D. Mullins Center, Massachusetts sent the Bonnies packing with a 79–65 win. Carroll was again the force for the Minutewomen, carrying UMass with 26 points and nine boards. Tricia Pawling led the way for St. Bonaventure, scoring 19. Mathews wiped the glass for the opponent, grabbing six rebounds.

Massachusetts will return home to play its final home game of the season against Rhode Island, Tuesday at 7 p.m.

two position, the three, the four and the five, and their bench beat our bench. Obviously, their coach out–coached me because I wasn't even out on the floor. We got beat soundly because they were the better basketball team today."

Calipari was replaced by associate coach James "Bruiser" Flint at the 9:29 mark of the first half and summed up his second coaching experience as one of learning.

"Well, I'm 1–1 now, I guess," Flint said. "We're down because we lost, but we're 26–1 now and we know what we've got to do, so let's go from here."

With finally losing their first game of the season, the Minutemen feel that the pressure is off them because the hype of an undefeated season no longer looms wherever they go. But they feel they still could be the best team in the country.

"Well, we did beat the team that I would guess will be No. 1 this week," Calipari said referring to second ranked Kentucky. "I think you do get a little soft. I tell [my players] all the time, the publicity and the notoriety are like poison. As long as you don't swallow it, you're okay.

"We've swallowed it."

"The good news is, there is no pressure now. It's play ball. The pressure's gone. Twenty–six and one is still pretty darn good. And we're still a terrific basketball team."

Guard Carmelo Travieso said, "We were getting sick and tired of hearing it [going undefeated]. We just wanted to go out and play. Now it's all out the window, so we're not going to hear it anymore. This is going to help us a lot because now we have to work harder.

"Our goal is to go the Meadowlands and perform there— we want to win the whole thing. We just lost this game."

Bulls beat Magic in marquee matchup

By Mike Nadel
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Michael Jordan, Shaquille O'Neal and Scottie Pippen were on the bench. Anfernee Hardaway and Dennis Rodman might as well have been.

At the beginning of the fourth quarter, the game belonged not to the biggest names on basketball's marquee teams, but to Toni Kukoc. "There is no doubt in my mind he was the difference," Orlando coach Brian Hill said Sunday after Kukoc buried the Magic in an avalanche of 3–pointers in leading the Chicago Bulls to a 111–91 victory. "When Kukoc came in and started dropping threes on us, I felt maybe we got a little discouraged."

A starter last season who has become a role player this year, Kukoc scored a season–high 24 points on 8–of–11 shooting — including 6–of–8 from 3–point range — as the Bulls improved to 25–0 at home. Kukoc scored Chicago's first 11 points of the fourth quarter to break the game open.

"I thought in a game like this, Mom's watching back in Croatia and he's got a reputation at stake, he would be effective," Bulls coach Phil Jackson said. "Toni has a tendency to play very big in big games."

Once known as "Europe's Magic Johnson," Kukoc has had trouble adjusting to life in the NBA — especially since Jordan came out of retirement last March.

"I was playing 40 minutes [in Europe]. I came here and my role changed," Kukoc said. "Here is MJ. Here is Pip. I've really got to wait for my chance. It was great to play like this. I wish I can every night. But sometimes it's hard coming off the bench." The Bulls led only 74–70 before Kukoc opened the fourth quarter with three 3–pointers and a bank shot for an 85–76 lead.

After Orlando's Nick Anderson hit a 3–pointer, the Bulls scored the next 11 points to make it a rout. Luc Longley began the run with two baskets and Kukoc capped it with a driving layup. Kukoc also made three consecutive 3–pointers in the second quarter as the teams played to a 53–53 halftime tie.

"Kukoc really hurt us in the first half when he hit those threes," said Hardaway, who had 24 points but couldn't keep the Magic's six–game winning streak going. "Then, he did it in the second and that's what killed us."

The Bulls are unbeaten in 32 regular season games at the United Center, last losing to Orlando on March 24 in Jordan's first home game since returning. Chicago, 49–6, rebounding from Friday's loss at Miami, moved nine games ahead of Orlando in the Eastern Conference standings.

"It's a little jockeying for playoff momentum. And we defended our home court," Jordan said. "The loss to Miami was one of those games where you just stink up the place. We showed our character that we could bounce back and focus on a much better team. We knew what the game meant from a mental aspect. We were ready."

O'Neal scored 33 points to 23 for Jordan, who was weakened by a virus. But O'Neal failed to make a "statement" in the players' first meeting since Jordan was selected All–Star Game MVP over a perhaps more–deserving O'Neal.

Not only did Jordan's team come away with the decisive victory, but O'Neal missed 10 of 17 free throws. And Shaq even lost the drawstring to his shorts late in the game and had to go to the bench for reinforcements.

"They played me one–on–one and their strategy worked," O'Neal said.

Regan clamped down and stopped a nifty fake by Scott Balboni on Providence's fourth shot, setting up Dan Campanale, who converted a shot through the pads of Dennis to seal the extra point in the standings.

Notes: Warren Norris, who has missed the past two games while serving a suspension for violating a team policy, is expected to return to the lineup for this weekend's crucial series with Boston College and Northeastern...The Minutemen have a solid chance of finishing seventh in the league and avoiding Boston University in the first round. A sweep of this weekend, coupled with a Northeastern loss to BU on Friday night will send UMass to Lowell in the opening round. BU solidified its hold on the league's top spot by downing UMass–Lowell 6–3 yesterday.

■ shootout

and the shootout. Many coaches in the league have expressed their displeasure with the procedure and last night's losing coach, Providence's Paul Pooley, is no exception.

"After coming back from a two goal deficit to tie the game," Pooley asked, "should my team feel like they lost? Did UMass really win that game, they might feel like they lost, losing the two goal lead. I wouldn't vote [in favor of keeping the shootout], like I did last year.

"I consider this a win for us, coming back like that. That was a solid game on the road for us."

The players also believe that the shootout is just too long of an extension of the game.

"I just want the whole thing to be over with," said Providence defensemen Eric Sundquist. "Just pack it in and get going, the point doesn't mean that much."

"I've been in them and Juniors and here," said UMass forward Tom Perry . "I would rather just have it end. If it ends in a tie, it ends in a tie. There's too much pressure on the goalies and the shooters themselves. I'd just rather see the game over."

The Warm Weather Is Coming...Are You Ready?!

Daily Collegian's Shape Up! Page

Early snow kept vegetation safe from frost

By Trudy Tynan
Associated Press

AMHERST — It may have been a persistent pain to shovel. But this long winter's snow could make for a quick burst of spring crocuses.

In many areas the snow came so early that the ground didn't get a chance to freeze deeply, said Bill Bramladge, chairman of the Plant and Soil Science Department at the University of Massachusetts. And then, as the months passed, the snow just kept piling higher and higher, acting like an insulating blanket over the earth.

That means spring bulbs will warm enough to begin sending out flowering shoots more quickly than in years when the November and December snow cover was spotty, he said.

Some home gardeners, who keep hardy root vegetables in protected spots for winter harvest, have dug through the February drifts to find unfrozen ground only a few inches below the surface.

All it took was a brief January thaw and some of his own daffodils were lively enough to begin sprouting, Bramladge said Wednesday. They were soon buried by another series of blizzards, but he expects them to survive their optimism.

"The danger for plants is a long stretch of mild weather, say two weeks or so when the plants break dormancy, and then a sudden cold snap with temperatures of zero or below," said Ron Kujawski, an education specialist with the Cooperative Extension Service based at the University.

And while spots of bare ground are visible even in the Berkshires, where the snow plows have been on the roads almost continuously since mid–November, none of the scientists was ready to predict that this week's thaw would last.

"I haven't heard of anyone talking about sugaring yet," Kujawski said. The surest sign of spring in the western mountains is the sap running in the sugar maples and the sweet smell of maple syrup on the boil.

Usually plants are unharmed by long periods of snow cover. Strawberry and perennial growers even cover their plants with hay or other mulch to simulate the insulation provided by snow cover that stretches from November through March, Kujawski said. The frost depth varies so much depending on location and soil type that no typical or average depths are available for the state, he said.

In Springfield, for example, city public works crews found the ground frozen to a depth of 3 feet when they had to dig earlier this week to fix a sewer break, said Jack Dowd, assistant commissioner.

But in Pittsfield, Public Works Commissioner James Forestall said his crews have hit unfrozen ground after digging for a foot. Some winters, he said, the ground has been frozen 6 feet deep under city streets.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — A spontaneous gathering could take place today. Someone reacts favorably to a business proposition or loan request. Influential people give you their support.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — Today could mark a turning point where your prestige is concerned. Reach out to people who share your commitment to excellence. A well- thought out plan will succeed.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Creative ideas and clever financial moves dominate the morning hours. Your generosity is admirable but can be carried too far. Be skeptical if approached by someone with an incredible sob story.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Unspoken fears can keep you from trying new things. Break free from the shackles of self-doubt. Romance takes on a rosy glow tonight. Perhaps you are ready to make a commitment. Be affectionate.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Getting better organized will ensure that your day runs smoothly. To avoid criticism, follow the rules set up by headquarters. Disobey them at your own risk.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Your popularity rises. Others like the fact that you don't take yourself too seriously. Explore a link between science and music. One- on-one relationships are favored tonight.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — A wonderful day for those in the fine arts. Invite an old chum to lunch. Sign contracts only after reading the fine print. If planning a night on the town, choose your companions carefully.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — Emphasize your passionate side without going overboard. Strong family bonds will aid your career efforts. Your words of encouragement will help a friend who is under considerable pressure.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — Someone promises a big return on an investment. Give serious thought to ending a relationship that is going nowhere. You do have other options.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — An excellent day for socializing, travelling and making introductions. A pet project could become a reality if you persuade someone influential to back you. Take advantage of a golden moment! Ask for an endorsement.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — A long-cherished dream can come true if you work hard. Count your blessings! Entertaining co-workers at home could create good will. Clear up paperwork before leaving the office. A strategic retreat improves a dicey situation.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — Dissatisfaction on the job could spring from unrealistic expectations. Be realistic. A timely concession could persuade someone to join forces with you. A long-sought accord will be reached when you agree to compromise.

He complained about the plastic ribbed dart board because the darts didn't always stick in it.
Then he hit the bullseye with a dart, but it bounced right off. "That was in!" he said. "That was in!"
Then he asked if he could have the points for it anyway.

My friend Benny came to my front door today. He was wearing almost the same clothes I was. But he's a loser.

Sure I have little things that I repeat over and over in my head, but Benny,..... well Benny has real demons that yell at him.... You should have seen him yesterday at my door.

His eyes were bloodshot, his forehead sweaty and he was making fists with his hands. He was wearing the same socks as I was, and the souls of his feet hurt.

He should admit himself into a hospital or take a college course or something.

I think I'll introduce Benny to my last girlfriend. That'll have the same effect as a week in the psych ward.... but it will cost a little more.

Jarvis and Colonials have Mass.' number

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

George Washington coach Mike Jarvis often liked to joke that his Colonials had won twice before against Massachusetts at the William D. Mullins Center, although there was only one victory of record— his team's 80–78 win over UMass a year ago (Feb. 14, 1995).

The other win he was referring to was UMass' win against GW two years ago when a Marcus Camby slam with a second left gave the Minutemen a thrilling 56–55 win, after the Minutemen hadn't led all game, and after a controversial offensive foul call on GW's Omo Moses.

Now Jarvis has his real second win at Mullins after his team's 86–76 upset of the No. 1 Massachusetts Minutemen Saturday.

"They beat us in every phase of the game," said Massachusetts coach John Calipari. "GW just beat our brains in."

The Colonials pretty much beat the Minutemen at their own game.

"UMass basketball is playing like if you lose, you're going to the electric chair. Well, guess what? It wasn't [Saturday]. You didn't see the fire. You didn't see the emotion and passion," Calipari said. "George Washington came out and right from the get-go were ready to go and they beat us at every position."

The Colonials are still the only visiting team to ever win a game in the Mullins Center in its four-year history, as UMass' record at Mullins now stands at 38–2.

The Minutemen can beat such top-ranked teams as Kentucky, Wake Forest, Syracuse, Georgia Tech and Memphis, but for some reason they have trouble beating the Colonials. In each of the last four meetings between the two clubs, the Colonials have come away with the win, and since the 1991–92 season, UMass is just 4–5 against GW — its worst record against an Atlantic 10 opponent during that time.

"It's probably more amazing that we can't play that way against everybody," Jarvis said. "If we could, we'd be undefeated."

In the first meeting between the two squads last season (Feb. 4), the Minutemen came into the game ranked No. 1 as well, and the Colonials dropped them, 78–75, in front of President Bill Clinton and his daughter Chelsea.

Ten days later UMass fell again, this time for the first time ever at the Mullins Center, leaving the UMass crowd stunned. The loss also snapped the Minutemen's 41-game on-campus wining streak.

"They have our number for sure," Camby said. "They came out here and executed their plays. They hit their shots and free throws. I have to hand it to them. They beat us last year without me, and they beat us this year with me."

The Minutemen's losing streak against George Washington began during the 1993–94 season when UMass lost to the Colonials 77–66 at the Smith Center on Feb. 27, 1994, a month after the Minutemen's last-second win at the Mullins Center.

"To me, they are still the No. 1 team in the country," Jarvis said. "It might sound crazy, but they might thank us for what we did today."

Indeed the Minutemen might thank the Colonials for this one. With the loss, the pressure of having an undefeated season is gone.

"Publicity and notoriety are like poison. As long as you don't swallow it, you're okay. Well, we swallowed it," Calipari said.

Once bitten, twice by Colonials

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

UMass suffered its first loss of the season to the Colonials of George Washington 86–76 giving the Minutemen a 26–1 record.

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

They are human after all.

The last undefeated team in college basketball is no longer as the Massachusetts men's basketball team lost to George Washington for the fourth straight time, 86–76, at the William D. Mullins Center Saturday. It was the second time the Minutemen have lost at Mullins, both times at the hands of the Colonials.

G. Washington	86
Massachusetts	76

After trailing by as many as 21 in the second half, UMass rallied back to within nine after a quick 11–2 run with three minutes remaining. Carmelo Travieso (game-high 23 points) was fouled hitting a three-pointer for a four-point play. Dana Dingle (15 points, 6-of-6 from the field) then was fouled on a putback, to cut the lead to single digits for the first time since 16–7.

Kwame Evans put an end to any threats of a miraculous comeback when he stepped behind the three-point arc with 1:59 left and lei fly the clinching trey as the shot clock expired.

UMass (26–1, 14–1 Atlantic 10) was never really close, as the only lead it held was Marcus Camby's lay–up 22 seconds into the contest for a 2–0 edge. GW then went on a 16–3 run and the Minutemen would get no closer until the final minutes of the game.

Senior co–captain Vaughn Jones led the Colonials with 21 points, including 13–of–16 shooting from the free–throw line, but it was the presence of Alexander Koul (14 points, six rebounds and two blocks in 21 minutes) that was one of the key factors in the game.

"He did the one thing I told him not to do," GW coach Mike Jarvis said of his center. "I told him not to leave his feet. He did and blocked Camby's shot early. That gave him some confidence and the rest of the guys some confidence. It was a key play in the game."

Koul's play was significant in the win, but also the team never really got in sync as coach John Calipari was ejected for picking up two technicals just over 10 minutes into the first half, and his "Best finisher in the country" Donta Bright (six points on 3–for–13 shooting), missed three dunks and a lay–up. Overall UMass shot a dismal 42.6 percent from the field for the game.

The Colonials (18–5, 11–2) shot a red–hot 51 percent from the field, hitting a lot of their shots in transition for easy lay–ups.

"I think you have to look at where those shots came from," Jarvis said.

Calipari, thrown out for disputing foul calls, may well have had a beef with the men in zebra stripes as the Colonials took 38 foul shots hitting 29 (76 percent), including 12–of–14 down the stretch, while UMass was 12–of–19 from the line.

"I would say that [getting thrown out] very much hurt our chances to win this game," he said. "I was not trying to get thrown out of the game, we were trying to win the game.

"They beat us at every position today, point guard, at the

Minutemen beat Friars in 4th consecutive shootout

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Saturday was a very long day for those who work in either the Mullins Center or the Massachusetts athletic department. Things got even longer Saturday night as the UMass hockey team went to overtime with Providence, and for the fourth time in as many games emerged with a tie.

Massachusetts	2
Providence	2

The Minutemen (10–16–5, 4–13–5 in Hockey East) and Friars (16–13–3, 11–8–3) skated to a 2–2 draw, with UMass taking the shootout 4–2. The four game streak extends the Hockey East records that UMass already held for consecutive shootouts and shootout wins.

In a defensively dominated game, both UMass' Brian Regan and PC's Dan Dennis turned in stellar performances, making 27 and 29 saves in their respective nets to help secure the tie.

The fact that the Minutemen could hang in with a highly skilled defensive team like Providence, on a night when PC was able to play its game, excites coach Joe Mallen.

"If you were to analyze our program from the start you'd see that last year we couldn't even get close in a lot of these games," he said. "When you get those ties, it sets you up to get wins next year or maybe even down the stretch this year. Going from three to four goal losses to these teams last year, to a lot of ties and being able to outshoot teams in shootouts is a big step for us."

ELIZABETH BROWN / COLLEGIAN

The UMass hockey team tied Providence on Sat. night, marking the squad's fourth consecutive shoot out.

The Friars are the most defensively oriented team in Hockey East, utilizing the neutral zone trap and an overall system comparable to that of the New Jersey Devils. Against this style of play teams can be doomed if they fall behind, but if the opponents can get up on the Friars, their entire methodology has to be scrapped.

"It's very important to get a lead on them, because if you do, then they don't play the trap and try different things," Mallen said. "It was significant when we got the first goal and the second was even better."

The Minutemen were successful at accomplishing this feat as they opened the scoring 10:33 into the contest. Rob Bonneau, working in the corner, fed Sal Manganaro at the top of the crease. Manganaro worked across the crease and slipped the puck under a prone Dennis for a 1–0 lead.

While the second period was scoreless, it was not without its share of goaltending moments, as Dennis robbed Blair Wagar with a great glove save early in the period. Regan saw his share of luck in the UMass net as well as Travis Dillabough clanked a 10 foot shot off the right post as time expired in the second.

UMass would take a 2–0 lead at 5:20 of the third after Mike Evans fed Tom Perry for a shot that was blocked. The puck ricochered wildly off of a couple of players and a dropped stick and returned to Perry, who fired it home.

The Friars mounted a comeback with Stefan Brannare converting a feed from UMass transfer Tom Sheehan for a power play goal at 10:33, and defenseman Erik Sundquist adding his third goal of the season just 33 seconds later.

Sundquist's goal was a soft wrister from the point that snuck through a screen along the ice, and just squeezed inside the post.

"I had a screen and I was just trying to throw it on net," Sundquist confessed afterwards.

With the score even, Providence continued their rushes, but Regan responded every time, stoning Friar captain Joe Hulbig's short handed break away bid with 3:37 left in regulation with a sliding stacked pad save. Regan made the exact same challenging save on a Russ Guzior bid mid–way through the overtime session.

The Minutemen and Friars exchanged blows for a few rounds of the shootout, the prettiest goal coming as Manganaro faked out Dennis and snuck a backhand into the top shelf.

Hockey scores in shootout, fans go crazy in close games

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen wanted to be more competitive with the other teams in Hockey East, supposedly in order to win more games, not keep the media from missing their deadlines.

For the fourth straight game after 60 minutes of regulation and five minutes of overtime, UMass was involved in a tie and thus partook in the Hockey East version of a tie–breaker; a shootout. And in as many games the Minutemen came out victorious by a 4–2 count, scoring on every given opportunity.

Though in the four three–point games for UMass there have been no wins, the formula in the scheme of things was good in the fact that two wins and two losses over the same stretch would only account for 10 points in the standing. Instead they have come away with 12.

Last season, the Minutemen were the only team not to participate in a shootout during the year of its inception. And though last year you may not have known what a shootout was, if you have followed the team at all of late, the procedure has become second nature.

Fan turn out in recent games at the Mullins Center has been encouraging, and the excitement brought to the arena by the shootout has a lot to do with it.

"I want to say that the fans tonight were great," said senior Sal Manganaro after the Minutemen's first ever shootout win two weeks ago against UMass–Lowell. "It was incredible skating down the ice like that with the fans going crazy."

What fans have learned to love, they might only have as a fond memory.

At the end of the season, Hockey East coaches will vote once again on whether or not to keep the five point scoring system

Preschool uses new educational style

EMILY BELT / COLLEGIAN

During freetime, four year old Yaejee Choe of Sunderland, plays with rocks and sand as Christine Mahony, an early childhood education major and student teacher looks on.

By Roseann Cohen

At the preschool lab in Skinner Hall, about 20 children, ranging from ages 2.9 to 4 years old, dance as if "The Circle Song" is going to be the next song to hit MTV Jams. Later, when lead teacher Dotty Meyer takes out a pair of magical sunglasses, the class cheers "Glasses, glasses, tell me what you see — tell me what you like best about me." But magical sunglasses and circle time is not what the Skinner Lab School is all about.

The Skinner Lab school offers University of Massachusetts students the opportunity to experience teaching preschoolers hands–on. Not only are the student teachers gaining experience, but they are learning some of the newest, most innovative approaches to teaching.

Meyer discovered the Reggio Emilia approach through George Foreman, a faculty member at the school of education who studied it. Inspired by Foreman, she and several others went to the town of Reggio Emilia in Northern Italy, to learn firsthand about the approach.

They brought back new educational methods which place the child at the center of curriculum development. Reggio Emilia had been successfully implemented in schools there and in several schools in the United States and Meyer was eager to implement them at Skinner.

Meyer spoke of the differences she saw between the traditional American approach and Reggio Emilia.

"With Reggio Emilia there is a negotiated curriculum. What that means is that the teacher and the child are working together to design the curriculum and really decide what kinds of things we'll study," Meyer said, explaining that the negotiated curriculum comes from the belief that children are eager to learn and discover new things. Meyer also said that learning is enhanced when children have some control over what they decide to learn.

However, according to Meyer, in American schools, both from a cultural standpoint and an educational one, life is more fast paced, even for preschoolers. "I've seen in my field that there is this rapid fire of activity planning. There's constant activity," Meyer said. "It's the American way of life. We talk fast, we eat fast food, we watch fast videos, and our kids, unfortunately, are a real product of that. The Reggio Emilia approach slows everything down. It helps children to think more, to focus more and to work more purposefully."

The class has been exploring concepts around police work, through role playing and even videotaping themselves. Meyer said that the teacher serves as a researcher who helps children investigate topics that they have chosen. Children return to the activity often, to investigate more in depth each time.

Student teacher Kristina Mahoney explained the value of this approach to learning. "By building slowly on these activities it provokes more of a thought process," said the senior education major.

One parent, who works at a local police department, recently brought in different props for the children to use and further their study of "cops and robbers."

Meyer said this was a key element in the approach. "In Reggio they envision a triangle — the child, the parent, and the teacher," she said. Student teachers learn about children's families through home visits, and parents are encouraged to visit and use the observation booth.

Susan Delmolino, whose daughter Gracie, age 3, attends the lab school was impressed with the program.

"As a parent, I really feel like I'm involved and know what's going on," she said.

Gracie was impressed too, talking about her favorite part of school. "I like the discovery room best, she giggled. "Because it has all the things we like best in it. Everything is my favorite thing," she said, smiling up at her mom.

Peres vows harsh retaliation after weekend bomb attacks kill 27

By Hilary Appelman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — With Israelis' nerves stretched tight following two suicide bombings, Prime Minister Shimon Peres promised yesterday that Israel would destroy the militant Palestinian group Hamas, which claimed responsibility for the attacks.

Despite his assurances, Israelis were obviously jittery a day after the bombings killed 27 people — the highest toll in a single day since 1978.

The charged atmosphere brought a new casualty: An Arab–American was shot and killed yesterday by Israeli civilians who feared he was a terrorist when his rented car crashed into a crowded Jerusalem bus stop.

Hundreds of police officers, convinced they were facing a new terror attack, rushed to the scene. But police later said the driver, Ahmed Abdel Hamida of California, apparently lost control of the car.

An Israeli woman was killed in the crash and 22 people were injured. It was not known whether the bystanders who opened fire faced criminal charges.

A reporter for Israel television said Abdel Hamida "paid the price for the hysteria that has overcome all of us."

Hundreds of Israelis gathered at the scene of the Jerusalem bombing yesterday, arranging memorial candles on the sidewalk to spell the word "maspik" — Hebrew for "enough."

Military funerals were held at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl Cemetery for five young soldiers killed in the blast.

Hundreds of people stood in the rain at services for 20–year–old Yonathan Barnea, an army sergeant who was the son of well–known newspaper columnist Nahum Barnea.

"You had no hatred, you had no hatred because I think that you grew up in a place where hatred was not a way of life," his father said in a eulogy.

A young American couple was among those killed in the Jerusalem bombing — Matthew Eisenfeld, 25, of West Hartford, Conn., and Sara Duker, 22, of Teaneck, N.J. After separate funerals, they were to be buried later this week in adjoining plots in Avon, Conn., a Connecticut funeral home said.

Twenty–five people were killed when a bomb exploded on a crowded Jerusalem city bus during Sunday morning rush hour. Less than an hour later, another bomb exploded near the coastal town of Ashkelon, killing two people. The bombers were apparently among the dead in both blasts.

Peres said the bomber in the Jerusalem attack came from Hebron, the only Palestinian town in the West Bank still under Israeli control. Peres said the bomber was known by security forces but his identity was not made public.

Both bombers apparently disguised themselves in Israeli army uniforms, Peres said, adding that the Ashkelon bomber even wore an earring. Traditional Palestinian society frowns on men wearing earrings.

Furor over headstones could wake dead

By Carolyn Thompson
Associated Press

BOSTON — At Blue Hill Cemetery in Braintree, dead couples and children smile from headstones, next to faces of Jesus and Mary. And golf clubs, swimming pools and Pillsbury Dough Boys are etched immortal in granite alongside crosses and flowers.

The juxtapositions are evident, too, at Holy Cross Cemetery in Malden. Among them, words from Scripture, offering comfort and hope are side–by–side with "No Guts, No Glory, Go For It."

Yves Porier has been making markers at Quincy Memorials for 15 years. He's handled requests for beer cans, marijuana cigarettes, pairs of dice and dancing elephants, along with the lily–bordered rectangles that, for years, had been the norm.

Porier recently made a marker for a 42–year–old man that included his name, date of birth, date of death and "Never Saw The Red Sox Win A World Series."

"There are always families that would like something that pertains to how one lived," Porier said.

He recalled one monument shaped like an open poker hand, a royal flush, with two granite dice at the base. "Obviously the man was a gambler," said Porier.

With the refinensent of etching during the past two decades and various other improvements, including the use of lasers and the addition of color, the technological possibilities for headstone designs are limitless.

That has not necessarily been greeted as good news, however, for the Jewish Cemetery Association, Roman Catholic Church and others seeking to preserve a more subdued, traditional atmosphere. "It makes all of my elder statesmen tremble," Bruce Schlossberg, of the Jewish Cemetery Association, said of the advances.

"We consider a cemetery a sacred place. It's really an extension of the church," said Father Arthur Dupont, director of Catholic cemeteries for the Archdiocese of Hartford, Conn. The archdiocese has been both praised and challenged for refusing to allow certain non–religious sayings and etchings on markers.

The family of one man whose favorite saying was "Boop Boop Ba Doo," reportedly was considering legal action against the archdiocese for refusing to allow them to install a marker reading, "Boop Boop Ba Doo, We Love You" in Mt. Olivet Cemetery in Watertown, Conn.

"Certain things are inappropriate for sacred places," Dupont explained. "Sometimes it's a close call, but Boop Ba Doo didn't even come close."

"One man's sentimentality is another man's horror," Dupont said.

A stone picturing two beer cans and engraved with "I did it my way," elicits double takes at Cambridge Cemetery. The marker is fine for a non–religious affiliated cemetery, but such a stone will never appear at a religious cemetery, officials said.

"You have to understand that when someone thinks something is wonderful and beautiful, it may be in their mind. But someone else may be mortified to see a Schlitz beer can on a headstone," said Donald Kenney, director of cemeteries for the Archdiocese of Boston.

"We take into account that every one that comes in here comes in because it's a religious cemetery," he said. "We try to maintain some decorum and dignity."

Before a marker is installed in any graveyard, the monument maker, after consulting with the deceased's family, submits a plan to the cemetery officials, who check to make sure it's of an appropriate size and nature.

For Schlossberg, the biggest problem presented by modern technology is the request that faces of the dead be etched into the stone.

"In Jewish tradition it's a graven image when put on headstones, and some Orthodox Jewish rabbis, especially, have protested," he said.

New coalition files suit to overturn new law restricting internet use

By Christopher McDougall
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — A coalition that includes computer industry giants Microsoft and Apple filed a federal lawsuit yesterday to overturn a new law restricting indecency on the Internet.

The lawsuit seeks to overturn the Communications Decency Act, which imposes a $250,000 fine and up to six years in prison for transmitting indecent material in such a way that children could find it on the Internet.

The Citizens Internet Empowerment Coalition argues that there are less restrictive means, such as in–home blocking software, to protect children or other users from offensive material.

"We believe that parental involvement, education and technology provide far more effective solutions to protecting children than this or any other law could," said the general counsel for America Online, Bill Burrington. America Online is the largest commercial Internet service in the United States with more than 4 million members.

Enforcement of the act has been blocked temporarily by another lawsuit, filed here Feb. 8 by a coalition led by the American Civil Liberties Union.

U.S. District Judge Ronald Buckwalter said the definition of indecency in the act, signed Feb. 1 by President Clinton, was too vague.

The law defines indecency as "any comment, request, suggestion, proposal, image or other communication that, in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs."

Sen. Jim Exon (D–Neb.), one of the law's sponsors, accused the computer companies in the new lawsuit of being "more interested in profits from pornography than protecting children."

Students rally at Chancellor's office; protest fee use

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

A group of approximately 100 students marched to Chancellor David K. Scott's office in the Whitmore Administration Building from the Student Union Building yesterday afternoon to rally support for the restructuring of the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF).

Representing a wide array of Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) and the Student Government Association (SGA), the march delivered a message to Scott, advising him that he had until March 5 to resolve the dispute surrounding the allocation of student activities fees.

The SATF is a $1.7 million fund controlled and financed by all undergraduate students. However, $450,000 is either taxed or forcibly expended each year by the University on services such as the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority.

The march was another step in a semester long organizing effort in which students reiterated to the administration the extent of their commitment to SATF relief.

"We fight for students, we fight for education," said Mike Hass of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, to cheers in front of Scott's Office.

At a meeting two weeks ago with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson and Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page, students resolved to give Scott until Feb. 26 to accept or reject their proposal to remove all limitations imposed by the University on the SATF.

Because of vacation plans and time restraints resulting from the official dedication of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, students agreed in a letter they personally delivered to the Chancellor's secretary Becky Dean, that he had until March 5 to submit a satisfactory proposal to the students.

"I think he supports us fundamentally," said SGA President Christine Lopes, who has been communicating with Scott on the issue. "But he is nervous" about the potential for conflict.

The march included a guerrilla theater rendition of "the Students Court," enthusiastically produced by the Theater Guild. Critical of the timing of Scott's vacation, he was proven guilty in a mock courtroom within the lobby of Whitmore for failing to recognize the importance of SATF relief.

As students marched upstairs, Robinson and Page were identified quickly leaving their offices. Subsequently, the door to the Chancellor's office was locked.

Students successfully negotiated with the Chancellor's staff to open the door, allowing them to deliver their letter, signed by each student involved in the march.

The Chancellor, however, was in Boston for the day attending University business.

"It's hard to say how he will react," said Hass. "He hasn't really said anything yet. If he wants to do a service, he can make the commitment and say 'yes.'"

The primary objection thus far from administration officials is that the University lacks the funds to compensate for SATF relief.

Student Trustee Dan Rivera disagreed and pointed to the Chancellor's Strategic Thinking Document, which will reallocate $33 million within the University. The money, he said, could be provided to boast student activity budgets.

"This is a really good way to kick the habit. They need to get off this fee," said Rivera.

"Education is not just in the classroom," said Maurice Caston, a SGA senator and candidate for SGA President, who emphasized that RSOs have been forced to seriously restrict their activities due to lack of funds.

"RSOs can't grow. They're actually shrinking," said Caston.

The student coalition will met again tonight, Feb. 27 at 7 p.m. in Earth Foods to discuss what their role should be while they await Scott's response. All interested students are invited to attend.

"We are not being irrational," said Rivera. "We're keeping our demands simple."

Caston and Lopes said that SATF relief will be a issue which students must face each semester.

"I think that it is important that this not be a one year effort," said Lopes.

Available financial aid declining

Student organization fights to salvage federal loan programs

By Seth Cohn
Collegian Correspondent

Federal student aid programs provide over $31 billion each year to students and their families.

Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) exists in order to protect students' rights to that money. SAFA is concerned with the decreasing availability of financial aid allotted to students. The organization's President, Allison Cervini describes the group's goal as, "Putting a face to the problem."

This year, congress is contemplating the elimination of four of the six major federal loan programs. The four programs on the chopping block are the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants, Federal Work-Study, Perkins Loans and State Student Incentive Grants.

If these programs were eradicated, the cost of college would increase by more than $20 billion over the next five years. The cost of going to college would experience its largest increase in U.S. history. Another cut that could take place is the dissolving of the Direct Loan Program. This would allow banks to reinvolve themselves in student loans. Banks would be able to place high interest rates on student loans, thus making them more costly to the student.

SAFA, which is a student run organization, is dedicated to protecting these programs and those like them from being cut or eliminated. In order to do so, the group makes a trip to Washington D.C. each year. In Washington, group members meet with congressmen to lobby for financial aid programs. Every year approximately 50 students make the trip. Each student receives formal training in lobbying techniques and policy analysis. This allows the SAFA representatives to discuss the importance of financial aid programs in a professional manner.

Cervini describes her group's situation as a fight to give students a voice in Washington.

"Banks and other financial institutions have lobbyists down in Washington all the time. We make sure that the students have a voice. We do so by meeting with the people in charge, face to face, on a professional basis," she said.

The organization was started 16 years ago by political science Professor Jerry Grady. Students in his class were concerned with their voice not being heard in Washington. So, a group of 12 students along with their teacher formed the group SAFA. Last year, 50 students made the trip to Washington.

SAFA meets once a week. Their next meeting is on March 3, at 7:00 p.m. in the Campus Center.

Jones predicts Weld will make run

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Correspondent

Martin Jones, chairman of the Bill Weld for President National Draft Committee, believes Gov. William Weld will enter the presidential race on March 5, substituting himself for Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.).

Jones is basing this theory on Sen. Dole's faltering campaign and a premonition he had on Sunday in which Weld eulogized Dole at a funeral.

The draft committee chairman led a rally yesterday outside the Fine Arts Center to raise public awareness around the 1996 election and to encourage Weld to enter the race for the presidency.

On Friday, Jones held a press conference at the Bangs Community Center in Amherst. In front of three supporters, Jones announced that his campaign would end Feb. 29 regardless of Weld's decision.

Jones, an African-American journalism student at the University of Massachusetts, founded the Draft Committee. In 1993, Jones gained national attention when he protested the Minuteman mascot, although he has since changed his mind on that issue. At the time, the governor called Jones' Minuteman protest "ridiculous."

Yet, on Friday Jones said Weld "protects" his interests and that he believes Weld has the best chance to win the Republican nomination.

Two weeks ago, during halftime of the UMass–LaSalle men's basketball game, Jones ran out on the court holding a sign that read "Pat Buchanan doesn't care about us." He was immediately taken into custody by Mullins Center officials.

When asked if he was pursuing legal actions against the University for the incident, Jones responded, "my lawyer and I are looking into possible violation of my First Amendment right."

Mullins Center officials could not be reached for comment.

Before the New Hampshire primary, Jones vowed to fast for seven days to formally protest Buchanan's win and, according to Jones, Buchanan's affiliation with the leader of a white-supremacist group, Christian Identity.

When asked if he had gone through with the seven day fast, Jones answered, "I lasted 24-hours from Tuesday 7 p.m. to Wednesday 7 p.m."

According to Jones, a pre-trial press conference for his suit against the University will be held in Northampton on March 21

As the eyes of the world are riveted toward the quest for peace in the Middle East, several University of Massachusetts students attended the Yale Model Israel Knesset (YMIK), which was held on Feb. 22–25 at Yale.

YMIK was a simulation of the Israeli parliament which involved over 100 students from colleges and universities throughout the United States and Canada. Delegates were assigned to different political parties and committees and debated bills that they had drafted.

YMIK Director Stephanie Cooper said, "The Model Knesset is a unique way for students to learn about the Israeli political system and to engage in constructive debate about the complex issues facing Israel today."

The program has been lauded by several government officials, as well. Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.) said of it, "This program enables the participants to understand Israeli politics, national security, the environment, religion and economics, while developing their leadership skills."

The bills that were passed by the Knesset were the Religious Sensitivity bill, Technology, Trade and Transfer bill, Constitution bill, Job Creation and Economic Growth bill, Cultural Appreciation bill, Immigration bill and Education Objectives bill. The delegates voted for the Job Creation and Economic Growth bill as the best of the session, so it will now be sent to the real Knesset in Israel for consideration.

The keynote address for the event was delivered by Ambassador Gad Yaakobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

The participants were given a chance to unwind at the YMIK party on Saturday night.

Marc Assa, a UMass senior Political Science major, said, "The Yale Friends of Israel did a great job balancing business and pleasure."

IRA talks fail to reach agreement

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Talks between IRA supporters and the British government, aimed at ending bombing attacks and creating a framework for peace negotiations, broke up without agreement yesterday.

The two-hour meeting between British civil servants and the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party was the first since the Irish Republican Army broke its 17-month cease-fire with a bombing in London on Feb. 9.

Sinn Fein had sought a guaranteed starting date for negotiations. Britain said that would be unrealistic unless the IRA first guaranteed a lasting cease-fire.

"The British government was not prepared to give us a specific date when all-party peace negotiations would begin," Sinn Fein chief negotiator Martin McGuinness told reporters outside Stormont, the government seat east of Belfast.

McGuinness, a reputed former IRA commander, called the situation "very grave indeed."

Sinn Fein first sat down with a team of British civil servants in December 1994, three months after the IRA stopped its quarter-century campaign of violence against British rule. Those talks bogged down when Britain demanded that the Catholic-based IRA start disarming as a "confidence-building measure" for the province's majority Protestants.

Yesterday's meeting coincided with the arrival of another battalion of British soldiers in Northern Ireland, where the IRA has yet to strike, raising overall troop strength there to about 17,500. Soldiers resumed limited foot patrols in Catholic parts of Belfast on Friday.

Security for the British royal family also has been stepped up following reports that an IRA man killed by his own bomb in London on Feb. 18 had maps and other documents suggesting the IRA may have Queen Elizabeth II or her relatives in its sights.

The British never identify the civil servants who meet with Sinn Fein, but Quentin Thomas and John Chilcott have usually been among them.

Sinn Fein's delegation included Gerry Kelly, who was convicted of IRA bombings in London on March 8, 1973, that killed one person and injured about 250.

In London, advisers to the British and Irish prime ministers, John Major and John Bruton, continued to seek a way to initiate negotiations.

All parties except Sinn Fein agree that the first step should be a resumption of the IRA cease-fire — a demand expressed Sunday when tens of thousands in the British-ruled north and the independent south of Ireland rallied under the banner, "Ceasefire Now! Give Us Back Our Peace!" It was the biggest demonstration against IRA violence since 1976.

Job lists now available on–line

By Melanie B. Arruda

Prospective employers target specific campuses and a highly qualified and motivated pool of student and alumni applicants via JOBTRAK Online.

The main concern among seniors is finding a job upon graduation, said Chief Financial Officer of JOBTRAK Ken Ramberg. Over 600 new job listings are published per day from employers specifically seeking to hire college students and recent graduates on the Internet site.

JOBTRAK Online has formed partnerships with over 350 college career centers nationwide, including the University of Massachusetts.

The database is "long on content and short on hype," according to Ramberg. Rather than containing fancy graphics or pictures the "data at our site is a valuable resource," he said.

"We use JOBTRAK to fill a variety of positions ranging from bookkeepers to chemists," said William Shell, the CEO of Interactive Medical Technologies. "I recently hired four skilled workers that I wouldn't have been able to find otherwise."

"The days of sorting through binders of job listings are over," said University of California at Los Angeles history major Chris Huffman. "Using my computer I can tap into JOBTRAK Online, search the job listings, access company profiles, and check out resume writing tips."

The jobs listed on this site span every industry although most of the sites are geared toward the technical fields, according to Ramberg. "Jobs range from public service to accounting and finance," he added.

Sixty percent of job listings are full time. The 40 percent that are part-time include internships, co-ops and summer opportunities.

Both students and employers benefit from this service through the "efficiency and exposure to the listings," said Ramberg.

The majority of the employers come from small to medium size companies. Over 170,000 employers have used the services provided by the organization.

"It is a win–win situation," Ramberg said. Companies can now just make one telephone call to the organization and select over 350 campuses nationwide. More than 70 customer service representatives help employers compose the ads, enter the information into the system and make the job listing available that evening.

"[Prospective employers'] job listings are being exposed to more students than ever before," Ramberg said. "So, they are able to fill the jobs faster."

Now, students have 24–hour access to jobs via the Internet from residence hall rooms, computer labs or homes. In the past, students were limited to office hours at a university's career center.

Along with the job listings, helpful career information is offered such as writing a resume, negotiating salary packages, successful interviewing tips, hundreds of company profiles and a skills assessment program.

"[JOBTRAK] is growing dramatically every day," said Ramberg. Approximately 10,000 students access the resource daily.

JOBTRAK can be found at http://www.jobtrak.com/ on the World Wide Web.

Countdown to the '96 Presidential Primaries

Editor's Note: As part of an effort to improve our coverage of the presidential primaries, the Collegian is running this feature everyday.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Day by day, bit by bit, presidential candidates have gone beyond the central message of their campaigns to visit a range of issues as broad as the country they want to lead.

The Associated Press is asking major Republican candidates and President Clinton to respond to one question each weekday during the primary season.

Here are the positions of the major presidential candidates on making English the official language. That step would require the federal government to communicate solely in English except on matters of health, safety and foreign affairs.

Would you support making English the official language?

Bill Clinton

Says English is "of course" the language of the U.S. but people should value "the culture, the traditions of everybody." Defends bilingual education. As Arkansas governor, signed official-English law for state.

Bob Dole

Supports. Says "we need the glue of language to hold us together."

Pat Buchanan

Supports.

Lamar Alexander

Supports. Says "English is the language of America." Former Tennessee governor backed early effort for state to have English law, favors similar step at federal level.

Richard Lugar

go for GREAT

We didn't get where we are today by waiting for great things to happen. We've made them happen. With alternative approaches. A high energy, across the board commitment to total quality. Innovation. And great people dedicated to changing today's working world, for the better.

That formula has made Interim Services, Inc. the fastest growing company in one of America's top three growth industries.

But when it comes to careers, why should your 'Go for Great' with Interim? Creativity. Diversity. Stability. Potential. Reward. A balance of individual thinking and team spirit. The same reasons we've attracted a talented, motivated workforce: fast-track players who've helped us redefine roles and rules as we create solutions to tomorrow's staffing issues, today.

And every day, as we put quality— and quality people— to work within our own corporate and franchise structure, throughout every Interim division, we 'Go for Great.' Maybe you should come along.

Interim offers exceptional career options in Sales, Operations, and Branch Management while providing personnel for the Legal, Financial, Medical and Light Industrial fields.

The war continues

Lately, more and more people have been criticizing the War on Drugs. This is a result of the fact that many see it as an ineffective waste of government money. Some go as far as to suggest that drugs should be legalized altogether.

Mark McGrath

Why then, is the government so adamant about keeping the war going? Contrary to what many believe, the war is continued not to keep fat cats on their high horses, but to keep in check forces in society that are so dangerous they're just plain scary.

Take "roofies" as an example. They are the latest craze in the drug market. They are very similar to Valium in nature, but are 10 times stronger. When mixed with alcohol, these tablets reach their mind-altering potential and become as dangerous as any "hard" drug out there. In fact, that very combination is what put Kurt Cobain into a coma shortly before his death two years ago. For many reasons, this sedative could soon become the DEA's most feared drug.

Why is this drug so dangerous? The first reason is because it is made and sold legally in countries all over the world, where it is used as a remedy for severe insomnia. In Mexico, Hoffmann LaRoche, the company which markets the drug, is literally making a killing selling roofies especially on the border with the United States. You see, international travelers are allowed to cross the border buy the drugs and re-enter with a three month supply for their own "personal use." Studies have shown that almost half of the prescription drugs declared at customs are roofies, and larger quantities are being smuggled in from Mexico and Colombia.

A second factor that makes this drug extremely popular, and therefore dangerous, is the fact that it can be obtained relatively inexpensively. At as little as a dollar a pop, roofies are really catching on with rave crowds and gangs. Being as inexpensive as it is, the drug is available to buyers in their teens. Because of the easy access, roofies are quickly becoming the drug choice for the younger generation.

Scared yet? As bad as these facts may sound, we haven't even scratched the surface yet. You see, among the effects roofies have on their users are blackouts, periods of time during which the user is unable to remember anything that happens to them.

Based on that fact, it is not difficult to figure out why this stuff is known as the "date rape drug." Apparently, some men have begun slipping it into the drinks of their unsuspecting female friends, knowing there will be no resistance to whatever they try, and that their actions will be difficult to prove in a court of law.

In crimes like the above mentioned, the victims are totally defenseless. How can someone be convicted of a crime which carries the penalties of rape without any testimony on the part of the victim? Prosecutors are starting to wonder the same thing.

When it comes to the terrible side effects of certain substances, you'd be hard pressed to find one as terrifying as that. The emergence of roofies is as dangerous a turn as any that has been taken by the drug culture for some time because it is easily used without consent and without knowledge of the possible outcomes. This drug violates in more ways than one.

How then can we, the innocent, fun-loving people of modern day America protect ourselves from this drug? The answer is very simple. We can't. We can keep a keen eye out, but that does not insure success in this battle.

One of the few lines of defense that remains is known as the War on Drugs. Thus far, 100,000 tablets have been seized in Florida and Texas alone. Two thousand seizures have been made nation-wide. For all you know, one of those tablets could have ended up in your cocktail. In that light, do you still see the War on Drugs as a waste?

Assassination of thought

One of the most clearly evident "afflictions" here at UMass is the level of political correctness enveloping every aspect of this university. Such a level has been created by, as the name indicates, politics. Not necessarily the politicians but more likely the politics alone.

Politics brought about by a society that is perverting our language so much that it's going down the drain faster than the average toilet flush. Now whether you agree with any statistical data on drainage speeds you can do nothing but concur with the realization that our language is being changed by certain circles of people. People who have nothing better to do than make themselves more appealing by hiding behind the mask of all this PC jargon.

Stop and think about all the things you have to be careful not to say in today's world.
Andrew Trodden

Too many people have been hoodwinked by the system into believing that if you change the name of something you actually change that something. Uh here... have some smelling salt because you need to wake up.

Whatever happened to good ol' pride in oneself. You know when all that matters is how you view yourself. Who gives a rat's tuchus what other people see when they look at you. Just knowing that you are happy and comfortable with yourself is good enough. If you're not happy with where you are at then change yourself, don't attempt to change the hearts and minds of the masses. Because it takes a long time to set up the dominoes but it only takes a few seconds to knock them down.

One can certainly stop and see that some of the PC that has become part of our daily lives is of some utility. But at the same time it doesn't take a scholar to realize that we've taken it a little too far. Make that, quite a bit too far. Which simply brings about the question, where does it all end? When we speak nothing but PC and the dictionaries of yesteryear are nothing but dusty, useless relics that could virtually be used as a history book for students to learn how we used to speak?

Sound crazy?

Maybe, but maybe not. Stop and think about all the things you have to be careful not to say in today's world. Then compare that to five or 10 years ago. After such a self-test one can plainly see all the examples of this politically, as well as socially, constructed form of mild censorship.

We live in a society with an open and free marketplace of ideas. So by vocalizing viewpoints such as my own, it is an attempt to promote thought and foster discussion on the subject. In this open market that we have, anyone with an adverse view (as I am sure there are many) has the same freedom to make their views known if they choose to do so.

The problem arises when the viewpoints presented are attempts to construct others to speak and act in a way similar to that of the person offering the viewpoint.

This is in effect a constraint placed on the marketplace. If we are all constructed to speak, act and think in a similar fashion we essentially become robots all sharing the same brain.

Now I ask, where in that lies room for individual thought and creativity? We think in language, and any constraint placed upon that is a constraint placed upon thought.

Can anyone else feel big brother's eyes peering down on them?

We need to realize that we are slowly creating this type of Orwellian society in which speech and thought could become heinous crimes.

Plain and simple, we need to stop. Otherwise maybe Orwell was only 20 or so years off.

Now I don't know about you, but that scares the hell out of me. So if it doesn't scare you, it should.

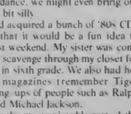
The party's over

Party. What do you think of when you hear this word? I used to believe that this meant, I don't know, a gathering of friends. A time when everyone just relaxes and has good fun. You see acquaintances that you might not have time to see during the week. Good music plays, people dance, we might even bring out the video camera and act a bit silly.

My roommates and I had acquired a bunch of '80s CDs (long story) and decided that it would be a fun idea to have an '80s party this past weekend. My sister was coming up so I knew she could scavenge through my closet for some great clothes I'd had in sixth grade. We also had her bring up some old teen magazines (remember Tiger Beat?) with some great hang-ups of people such as Ralph Macchio, Alyssa Milano and Michael Jackson.

However, I'd have to say the most enjoyable part of the night occurred around 7 p.m., when we were all in the bathroom applying our blue eye shadow and frosted pink lipstick. Before everyone arrived we were having a great time. Unfortunately, my idea of what makes a fun party apparently isn't the same as everyone else's.



Dawn Jennings

It was great to catch up with some old friends whom I hadn't seen in awhile. However as the evening progressed the apartment soon began to fill up. Lots of people I didn't know began making themselves very comfortable. Before long I stopped having much fun. I'm not sure if it was when I discovered someone had walked out with one of my favorite posters, or when I had to recover the bowl of soup someone had found in my cabinet and was about to heat up in my microwave, that I really lost it, but at that point I was no longer having much fun. I don't know, call me crazy.

Then the manager of our building came to warn us that he was going to call the police if everyone wasn't out of the apartment immediately. He didn't say that we could make exceptions for those people who, "were having a lot of fun," or "had just gotten there." To anyone who felt they didn't get their money's worth, the thousand dollar fine our friends had just escaped the night before was a bit more on my mind than your couple bucks (sorry). I also apologize, but he didn't say that everyone could "just finish their last beer and then leave," either.

As we were trying to remove everyone from our apartment, a huge brawl broke out. It resulted in one of our friends going to the emergency room for five stitches and a few others getting black eyes and numerous bruises. Because I have a limited amount of space, I won't even attempt to try to analyze why guys can't seem to drink without trying to kill one another. Unfortunately, after they left for the hospital we still couldn't even relax. People were still in our apartment. We even ended up having to call the cops ourselves because someone refused to leave. Why anyone would want to remain somewhere they were obviously not welcome is beyond me.

As we were trying to clean up the peanuts, that someone had miraculously found somewhere in our cabinets (I didn't even know we had any), from our rug the next day, my roommates and I discussed the "party." I use that word liberally. None of us had had much fun. It wasn't the mess, because that was expected. It was the complete lack of respect that some people seem to have for others and their possessions that was what bothered us.

It's as if anything that isn't locked away in a room or bolted down is fair game. People seem to forget that when they go to someone's home for a party, it's still that person's home. The food on the shelves and in the refrigerator is the same food that these people are going to eat throughout the week. Sorry, but I didn't go out and buy that Swiss Miss pudding and those Wheat Thins for the party. A cup charge entitles one to beer, it's not a pass to go through the kitchen drawers to find the hidden gum. It was hidden for a reason. I also don't remember saying to take a souvenir from our walls on the way out. No matter how cool you thought the poster was. In the two years my roommates and I have lived off campus we've had CDs, posters, a thigh master, a water filter, two cases of soda, numerous amounts of food and who knows what else stolen. Not to mention any of the fights and messes that have been made. These things make up completely for any sort of profit we ever might have made.

A good party can be a lot of fun. It's a nice change from always going uptown. I'd also like to see anyone ever spend only three or four dollars at the bars. However, you've got to respect the person's house you're at. Think of your own place. If you wouldn't want someone putting gum in your couch or eating your lunch for next week, chances are others don't like it either.

Just think about it.

Nixon Orr naked people

It's the ghost of Collegian's past.

The Collegian newsroom and the W.E.B. Du Bois library has archives of old Collegians (or the College Signal, depending on the year) dating back to 1911. Some of the stuff is pretty funny.

I picked up a volume from the Spring of 1974. Of all the books on the shelf, I figure I'd look at the semester I was born. If your parents went to school during this time, or you know someone who did, you should check this out — there is a lot of material you can use against that generation here.

Tim White

The first thing that I learned was these people were really horny folks. Every paper had at least five advertisements for different porn movies or strip joints around the Pioneer Valley.

Showcase Cinemas has The Sting with Robert Redford and Paul Newman, while in the next theater The Naughty Stewardesses is delighting its audiences. This is a special engagement... please no passes or senior citizen discounts.

Turn to March 7, 1974 and take a look at the picture at the bottom of the page. Naked people. About nine buck- naked men and women are running for what was apparently the annual Spring Streak.

The people back then did it in style — and numbers. According to the story accompanying the picture, headlined "Let's streak around the block tonight," a crowd of approximately 250 streakers were attempting to capture the world streaking record.

And I thought the '70s was the decade everyone slept through.

The editors of the Collegian took complete advantage of this night because there is a full spread of pictures showing naked people in the middle of the paper. In the story, the writer states "...as the streakers, who included at least 25 women..." He counted. Now that's accurate journalism. It's funny that only 10 percent of the naked people were women, but 50 percent of the pictures had naked women in it. You think the Collegian has problems now?

Monday, April 1, 1974 — a common headline makes the front page "UMass tuition going up??" The story states that the tuition could rise to almost $2,000. Hi, meet my inflation. Editors for the Collegian then would blow a spleen if they saw our tuition today.

Michael Dukakis couldn't even make front page back then. The April 25, issue has a story about his gubernatorial campaign on page three. Unfortunately, it is impossible to read the story because you're too busy staring at his enormous nostrils in the picture.

Here's some excerpts from the story that accompanied the pictures: "Well, we smoked this really fine dope... Then we did some THC we brought from home, and that made things kinda mellow... we did the mescaline we bought off this guy and his old lady... By the time Aerosmith got on, we were peaking on the mescaline." There was nothing on the actual concert, and I left out the swears.

Back then, they started to charge five cents per paper. I wonder if we tried to do that today, would it sell? I'm sure the paper would sell well if we put photos of naked people in it.

Turn to page 15 of the March 1 issue, and check out the wall of Schlitz cans that decorated the entire hall of the third floor James House. You have to see how many cans there are, it's obscene. And somebody had to drink all of those. Have you ever had Schlitz? Holy ulcer, Batman. According to the article, it was 3,500 cans of Schlitz and the pull off tabs were to be used to buy a seeing eye dog for someone. At least it was for a good cause.

Take a look at history sometime — follow Watergate and Richard Nixon, or turn to the sports page and see Bobby Orr lead the Bruins.

Or just check out the naked people on page 12, March 7, 1974. Didn't you say your mom was an alum?

Argentinean plays Iron Horse

Saxophonist Barbieri led quartet through steamy jazz tune

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

GATO BARBIERI
Iron Horse
Feb 22

NORTHAMPTON — Clad entirely in black, with only a bright red scarf tied around his neck to spark the audience, Grammy award winner Gato Barbieri took the Iron Horse stage last Thursday night.

Barbieri started around 10:30 p.m., over a half hour after his show was scheduled to begin. Without a single spoken word, he launched into his first song, an up-tempo, Spanish style piece.

Close your eyes and you can see yourself at an Argentinean street fair — kids yelling, people dancing, bright costumes lining a crowded sidewalk, the roar of the crowd getting louder with every coming beat. Barbieri, confident that his four member band could convey this chaotic message, stood off to the side, cradling his saxophone like a child with his favorite security blanket.

As the tempo increased Barbieri seemed more at ease performing for the excited audience. He donned a pair of sunglasses and strutted around the stage, sporadically yelling "Yeah" into the microphone. With the music seemingly busy at times, the band blended their respective instruments together splendidly, led by the screaming sax of Barbieri.

The 12 minute long song wound down with a final gliss of the piano and the decreasing tempo of the percussion. The listener was then transported form the busy street fair to the calmness of a Caribbean pool-side, drink in hand, the music only in the background. Barbieri effectively brought the audience from their excited merry state to a calm, more appreciative state, all in his opening piece.

Barbieri's second piece garnered applause from the audience barely after its opening chord. He slowly built up the tempo, adding various pieces of percussion into the melody individually, until his desired speed was achieved. His sax was neither forefront or posterior, it simply seemed to be away from the rest of the piece, singing a solo tune.

It was during this song that Barbieri began one of many walks through the audience, stopping and playing at individual tables, sauntering around and only reluctantly stepping back on stage.

Once he did regain his position on stage he leaned up against the wall, off to the side, almost uncomfortable at the attention he was receiving. With one foot on the floor and one perpendicular to the wall, he looked like the image of a lonely sax player standing on a corner under a streetlight — playing his masterpiece for the alley cat who is trying to find shelter from the rain.

Barbieri kept up this intensity throughout his two hour show. Although lacking a little in stage presence, his talent as a musician and his superior saxophone playing was able to keep the audience enthralled and quite excited.

A notable mention should go to the quartet with whom Barbieri played. Consisting of a pianist, a bassist and two percussionists, they complemented the saxophonist extraordinaire brilliantly. Although sometimes Barbieri relied too much on the percussion instead of focusing on his sax, it provided a break from the sometimes monotonous songs.

Barbieri ended his show yelling, "Hey Latin ladies, hey... hey," and broke into a straining slow ballad which progressed into the usual quick tempo piece. His finale was characteristic of the entire show — energetic, fast and wonderful. This Argentinean gave the audience everything and more.

Country star charms crowd with tales

KATE CAMPBELL
Iron Horse
Feb 25

NORTHAMPTON — Singing her soulful, heartfelt, true to life songs, Kate Campbell brought her southern charm to the Iron Horse last Sunday night.

Campbell appeared on stage with only herself and an acoustic guitar. Clad in black denim jeans and a flannel shirt, she looked the total opposite of the image of a country star. There were no glittery costumes or an elaborate stage set up, just a talented woman and her beautiful voice.

She began her set with a song from her debut album Songs From the Levee. "You can fall like the rain/And I will be the river," the opening lines from her spiritual song "Lanterns on the Levee" rang through the ears of the silent, enthralled audience. Her crystal clear voice brought life to the wonderful piece about staying strong and true love.

Campbell then gave the audience a little autobiographical story about her life in Mississippi, an appropriate lead-in to her childhood tale, "Mississippi and Me." Here Campbell recounts memories of living in a small town, introducing characters Cissy, the hairdresser with bad hair, and Thomas Lee, a banker who believes he is Elvis.

Immediately following, Campbell introduced a new song explaining, "This is the continuing saga of Cissy the beautician. She decided to take a little adventure." In this new song, which Campbell plans to record for her forthcoming album, the listener joins Cissy on her road trip around the south, in search of "Rock City."

Between each song Campbell told the crowd a little about how the song came into existence and what it was about. This interaction with the audience gave the show a very personal feel, it was almost as if Campbell wanted to hang up her guitar and sit down at one of the tables for a conversation.

After playing a few favorites from her album Campbell introduced another new song. "I thought about my life and sometimes it seems an inanimate object we are given along the way has a way of holding memories," she illustrated. Thinking along these lines helped me write this song." She then began a wonderful tale about her first car, a Galaxy 500. It seems natural that a country artist should write a song about a car and Campbell is no exception. But Campbell effectively captures real and visceral emotion in her song.

Campbell ended her set with a song about which she said, "I wrote this for my family and I sing it for my family." Her account of southern living, "Bury Me in Bluegrass" was a perfect ending to an exciting show.

Campbell's musical portrait of hopes, dreams and just barely surviving is characteristic of her songwriting. Her songs never sound false or superficial, instead they are full of honesty and openness, two attributes that her listeners can relate to. This lyrical ability and her clear, full voice gave the Iron Horse audience a spectacular show that left a lasting impression.

Jazz legend finds way to UMass

Groundbreaking jazz guitarist John McLaughlin performs at Bowker tonight.

By Matt Wexler
Collegian Staff

Tonight at 8 p.m. in the Bowker Auditorium, legendary guitarist John McLaughlin will bring his latest project, The Free Spirits trio, to amaze the crowd with yet another groundbreaking achievement.

McLaughlin began his career in the United States with Tony Williams' Lifetime, working with the late Larry Young. After being inspired by this band and releasing an album named Emergency!, he was invited to join trumpeter Miles Davis. McLaughlin turned down this first offer by Davis until Lifetime disbanded, whereupon McLaughlin played a hand in two of Davis' masterpieces, In A Silent Way and Bitches Brew, the first fusion experiments between jazz and rock music.

After these two projects, McLaughlin began using both electric and acoustic guitars, bringing his fusion experiments to new levels, melding both rock and jazz with The Mahavishnu Orchestra. This band graced the music world with a number of astounding albums, most notably The Inner Mounting Flame and Birds of Fire.

The Mahavishnu Orchestra sold hundreds of thousands of records, sold out shows worldwide and made John McLaughlin an indispensable name to the world of guitar. But while Davis was continuing fusion experiments with not only jazz, rock and funk, McLaughlin took another road — an extreme road at that, trying his hand at the melding of Eastern Indian music and jazz with a band called Shakti. His band produced an exotic, explosive sound, which, while it may be unusual to ears nourished by Western music, is nonetheless enchanting and impressive.

The show slated for this evening will be a return to the electric sounds for which McLaughlin is often noted for, accompanied by Dennis Chambers on drums and Joey DeFrancesco on keyboards. Chambers exploded onto the music scene as the drummer for George Clinton's funk behemoths, Parliament and Funkadelic. He is an extraordinary percussionist to say the least, having established himself in the groovy mainstream realm of funk in the '70s and making a name for himself with modern jazz giants as well.

DeFrancesco is an equally amazing musician, being in his 20s and already a powerhouse on keys. He is said to be responsible for the resurgence of the Hammond electric organ which was all but abandoned by musicians during the reign of electronic synthesizers. At the tender age of 17, Miles Davis snatched him up and brought him on tour. It was through Davis that McLaughlin was introduced to DeFrancesco backstage at a concert.

All of McLaughlin's achievements are notable, and even his minor projects are only minor compared to his groundbreaking efforts. He has journeyed the realms of jazz, brought foreign and exotic sounds to our ears, stood on the front lines as the first shots of the fusion revolution were fired, jousted with the likes of fellow guitarists Al DiMeola and Paco De Lucia (making for a delicious album of guitar prowess on A Friday Night in San Francisco) and continues to amaze audiences with his expertise on both electric and acoustic guitar. The Free Spirits are already being noted to be another musical victory for McLaughlin ever since their emergence with a live recording of their act in 1993 in Tokyo.

Never one to stop seeking new ideas or new directions to explore, John McLaughlin will continue to thrill audiences with his inventiveness. The Free Spirits is another step along McLaughlin's path, and it is sure to be an impressive one.

John McLaughlin performs at Bowker Auditorium tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets are $6 for students and $9 for the general public. Advance tickets are available though the Fine Arts Center box office or tickets may be purchased at the door.

Shift & Shades Apart play to small crowd

SHIFT AND SHADES APART
Pearl Street
Feb. 25

This was one of the weirdest shows so far this year — with two incredible headlining bands and so many negatives that it dragged the show down.

For starters, while the doors opened at 7:30 p.m., the first band didn't go on until 8:45 p.m. Secondly, there was a small turnout of about 50, pathetic for such a good show. On top of that the kids who were there behaved as if they were sedated. To make matters worse, two of the opening bands Empty and Baby Gopal had no business playing this show. Empty are a lame folk band who sounded like Hootie and the Blowfish. Meanwhile the only relation Baby Gopal had to hardcore is that their lead singer is married to Rap Cappo of Shelter.

Despite the problems, hardcore veterans Shades Apart belted out an above average set. Although they suffered from technical difficulties they were the first band to really put something extra into their music. Their set consisted almost entirely of songs off their last album Suive It, although they did throw some of their older songs into the set. Shades Apart put a lot of energy and emotion into their shows and it was a shame that the crowd, other then bobbing their heads, didn't respond appropriately.

Shift finally took the stage at 11:45 p.m. The band recently added a second guitarist and he really adds extra force to their songs. In fact, Shift came off a lot more powerfully then they have on any of their albums.

They played almost all the songs from their first EP Pathos and some songs form their new LP Spacesuit. Thankfully they played the harder songs and left the mellower songs out of their set. The crowd finally got into it and people moved a little. It's sad to note that Shift put more energy into the set jumping around on stage then the crowd did all night.

Despite a lame crowd and some other problems, Shift and Shades Apart, two truly great hardcore bands, played their hearts out.

Lesbian to promote book in Hadley

Newman's My Lover Is A Woman a collection of love poems

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

Contemporary lesbian author Lesléa Newman will be speaking at the Odyssey Bookstore in South Hadley this Wednesday night to promote her new book My Lover is a Woman.

Newman is the author of over 20 novels and collections of poetry. Her most famous novel, and most controversial is the children's book Heather Has Two Mommies, the story of a lesbian couple raising a child. She is also the author of the brilliant non-fiction book The Femme Mystique.

Her literary talent has won her many awards over the past few years. They include a Massachusetts Artists Foundation Fellowship in Poetry and a second prize in the Raymond Carver Short Story Competition. In addition, three of her books have been named Lambda Literary Award Finalists.

Her latest book, of which she is the editor, is collection of poems from lesbian authors. This anthology chronicles lesbian love over the years. The stunning, romantic and sometimes chilling poems explore and define women's sexuality.

The collection includes works from prominent poets and authors such as Dorothy Allison, Patricia Monaghan, Susan Stinson and Newman herself. Each poet exhibits a deep sense of love, hate, grief and erotica in each of these extraordinary poems.

In Newman's three poems, she explores one of the most recurring theme in this collection, that of relationships. Alluding many times to a butch lover, she expresses both the feelings of being in a confining relationship to the excitement of a first date.

Each poem chronicles both the struggle and fulfillment of being in a same-sex love relationship. With fierce intensity, these women write against societal taboos and display passion and resilience in their brilliant writings.

My Lover is a Women combines the talent of women from many back grounds and cultures and throws it all together in a stunning anthology full of integrity. A wonderful collection to add to any library.

Command & Conquer allows game users to test tactical prowess

You are a young officer in the military and your country is threatened by foreigners; the future of your nation and the world lies in your hands. That is the premise of Westwood Studio's Command and Conquer, a new strategy game.

The game is set in the near future where the status quo of the G7 is threatened by a renegade band of developing nations known as the Brotherhood of Nod. Although the backdrop involves international politics, no knowledge of supply and demand is necessary to win this game, you simply have to have tactical prowess of General Colin Powell.

A feature I loved about the game is the option which allows you to choose which side of the battle to join. You can either work your way up the ranking in the Brotherhood or Global Defense Initiative of the G7 (GDI). An actor will debrief you on the details of your mission after you choose your alliance. Following the mission debriefing, the computer switches the scene to the beginning of the battlefield in a three dimensional world.

After the intermission is completed the actual battle begins. Whether you are playing a Nod or GDI mission, you usually either start out with a small band of troops, and limited equipment. Some missions allow you to establish a base where more troops can be trained and in later missions equipment can be built. Equipment in this game ranges from jeeps to tanks to jets and even nuclear weapons in the final missions — only Nod forces have access to nukes.

The game should provide hours of enjoyment because the missions are quite challenging. The same mission could be played over and over again because the computer will not use the same strategy twice. Each mission becomes progressively harder.

The game encompasses two CDs to hold all the data for the missions. The CD labelled Nod is for those missions, and obviously the one labelled GDI is for those missions.

In the game manual Westwood said they chose to place the game on two disks to assist in network game play. A feature I have not taken advantage of is the network option. The network option allows for the game to be played across modems, a network, and even the Internet. The network feature allows players to go head to head rather then simply playing the computer. Since the TAUs do not tie up the phone, and operate at 19,200 bauds, this feature would be great in the dormitories.

The only major problem I had with this game was a lack of memory. Because I was operating the game out of Windows 95 with the minimum requirement of eight megabytes, the sound in intermission scenes stuttered. However, I had no problem with game play, which I enjoyed greatly.

This game requires at least a 66 MHz 486 with eight megabytes memory, a double speed CD-ROM, SVGA graphics, a mouse and a sound card. The game is compatible with DOS, Windows 3.1 and Windows 95 in the DOS mode. The suggested retail price is about $60, but it can be found for about $39 at most retailers. A–

Kentucky No. 1; Reid suspended

By Mike Embry
Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — With the regular season winding down and the NCAA tournament approaching, Kentucky coach Rick Pitino isn't getting caught up in his Wildcats returning to No. 1.

"There's not too much difference between one and two," he said Monday. "The important thing in the regular season is that you try for a high seed, and whether you're one or two doesn't have much significance."

Kentucky (24-1), the preseason choice at No. 1, had been second to Massachusetts for the Minutemen's entire nine-week run at No. 1 in the AP poll.

The Wildcats were the overwhelming choice of the national media panel to replace UMass, which lost its first game of the season on Saturday. All but two of the 66 first-place votes went to Kentucky, which had 1,648 points.

UMass (26-1), the only team to beat Kentucky, got the other two first-place votes and 1,563 points.

Pitino doesn't believe his players will have trouble staying focused despite carrying the No. 1 tag. Kentucky plays at Auburn on Tuesday night.

"You try to become a better team every night out and execute," he said. "You're really not looking at anything. Outside of that, we just try to take care of the present tense, and not look back or look ahead.

"If you do that, I think you can take care of business the right way."

Kentucky has won 23 consecutive games, the longest in Pitino's seven years at the school, and the longest since "Rupp's Runts" won 25 straight to start the season 30 years ago en route to reaching the NCAA title game.

Kentucky held the top spot for the two polls of the regular season until losing to Massachusetts in the Great Eight. Kansas moved in for three weeks until losing to Temple in the Jimmy V Classic.

Massachusetts then claimed the top spot and held it until this week, the longest run at No. 1 since Duke was there for the entire 1991-92 season.

The Minutemen's first loss was to George Washington (18-5) and it got the Colonials into the rankings for the first time since midway through the 1993-94 season.

Massachusetts was far from alone as a ranked team that lost last week. Fifteen Top 25 teams lost a total of 16 games from Monday through Sunday with Boston College, the team George Washington replaced in the rankings, losing twice.

Kansas moved from fifth to third this week and was followed by Connecticut, Purdue, Villanova, Cincinnati, Georgetown, Texas Tech and Utah.

Arizona led the Second Ten and was followed by Penn State, Wake Forest, Memphis, Syracuse, Virginia Tech, UCLA, Georgia Tech, North Carolina and Iowa.

The last five ranked teams were Louisville, Wisconsin-Green Bay, Iowa State, George Washington and Stanford.

Memphis and Georgia Tech tied for the week's biggest jump at five places. Memphis (20-5) won three games last week while Georgia Tech (18-10) won both its games and took over first place in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

The biggest drop was Virginia Tech's fall from 12th to 16th after splitting two games in Philadelphia, a close win over LaSalle and a 16-point loss to Temple.

Reid suspended

NEW YORK (AP) - J.R. Reid of the New York Knicks was suspended for two games without pay and fined $10,000 by the NBA Monday for flagrantly elbowing Phoenix's A.C. Green in the mouth during a game.

Reid's elbow knocked out two of Green's teeth in Sunday's game. The fine and suspension were the stiffest penalty in NBA history for throwing an elbow. Reid will miss Monday's game against the Los Angeles Lakers and Wednesday's game at Sacramento.

Although he lost two teeth, Green may play Monday night against the Utah Jazz and continue his league-leading streak of consecutive games. A Suns spokesman said doctors hoped to outfit Green with a mask that would allow him to play against the Jazz.

He has played in 784 straight games dating back to 1986, tops among active players and third all time. Randy Smith played in 906 straight, and John Kerr appeared in 844.

X-rays showed there was no fracture of Green's jaw bone, but the sockets that held Green's lost teeth in place were cracked by the blow, lengthening the period before they can be replaced.

Wayne Gretzky is still a King for now, but Blues ready to deal for 'Great One'

By R.B. Fallstrom
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — The St. Louis Blues, by far the most aggressive team in the NHL free agency era, appeared to be closing in on the biggest catch of all.

But for now, Wayne Gretzky remains with the Los Angeles Kings. He was expected to play yesterday night at Winnipeg.

"At this point, he is definitely playing," Gretzky's agent, Mike Barnett, said yesterday morning.

The Blues were poised to give the Kings rookies Craig Johnson and Patrice Tardif, 19-year-old prospect Roman Vopat and their No. 1 pick in the 1997 Entry Draft, to get the 35-year-old Gretzky.

Hockey's career leading scorer would fit right in with the win-at-any-costs philosophy followed by the Blues in recent years.

They've lavished big money on the likes of Scott Stevens, Brendan Shanahan, Dale Hawerchuk, Geoff Courtnall and Shayne Corson with free-agent deals.

Their current general manager and coach, Mike Keenan, got a five-year, $10 million deal to jump ship from the New York Rangers, fresh from winning the Stanley Cup, in 1994.

And now, apparently, they're ready to top even that one. Keenan was out of town and unavailable for comment yesterday, his secretary said.

But according to reports, the only elements left to clinch the deal were financial arrangements, including a new contract for Gretzky, who is making $6.5 million this season.

That apparently was the sticking point in a trade between the Kings and Rangers, who had offered Luc Robitaille, Ray Ferraro and about $2 million, that fell through. Gretzky likely would want a three-year deal worth $21 million to remain as hockey's highest-paid player.

The reason for the likely move isn't all about money, however.

Gretzky has asked management to either upgrade the Kings, who were ninth in the Western Conference with an 18-30-15 record and 51 points, or trade him to a Cup contender.

Gretzky can become a free agent after this season, and if the Kings don't sign him they risk losing him without compensation.

Sporting goods dealers in St. Louis were poised for the deal to happen, so they could begin marketing Gretzky replica jerseys.

"We haven't actually committed money to it, but we're ready to move if it happens," said Ken Davies, co-owner of Shanny's Center Ice in suburban Kirkwood. "And it sounds like it's going to happen."

On the surface, the Blues would seem to be unlikely suitors. For one thing, the team's ownership group ordered Keenan to cut the payroll this summer.

For another, the Blues are playing at close to capacity at the year-old Kiel Center and likely couldn't quickly recoup their investment with gate receipts alone.

With 21 regular-season games left, the Blues' average attendance is 18,278 — 982 short of a nightly sellout.

Kings general manager Sam McMaster has denied that a deal had been made with the Blues, and the Los Angeles Times played the Gretzky soap opera on page 2 yesterday.

But ESPN reported that a deal might be wrapped up as early as this morning and that Gretzky would be in a Blues uniform for their next game Thursday night at Vancouver.

Gretzky has 829 goals and 1,757 assists for his career, both NHL records. This season he has 15 goals and 65 assists in 61 games.

Organizers of the New Balance Haigis Hoopla VI basketball festival have announced a slogan contest, open to fans of all ages. Contestants should create a slogan that aptly describes the excitement surrounding this annual weekend basketball event which is scheduled for April 21-22 at the Haigis Mall.

Slogans should be no longer than one concise sentence. The winning entry will receive a pair of New Balance athletic shoes. In case of a tie, a random drawing by Haigis Hoopla organizers will determine the winner. Contest entries must be received by March 1, 1996.

Mail entries to: "New Balance Haigis Hoopla VI Slogan Contest", c/o Sport Management Department, University of Massachusetts, Curry Hicks Building, Box 31820, Amherst, MA, 01003. Telephone/fax entries to: Mick Jackowski, Haigis Hoopla VI, (413)545-1723, (413)545-5818 (fax).

For more information, call 545-5689. Admission is free for spectators. Proceeds of this event go to the UMass Erik Kjeldsen Scholarship Fund, benefiting a senior Sport Management student.

Swimming

that the team had fulfilled its hope of winning their first ever title in memory of Greg Menton, a great swimmer and friend who had passed on earlier in the year.

"Everyday we wrote 'GM' on our chests and the conclusion of the season and the entire tournament was dedicated to him," said Laporte.

Yarworth received the Coach of the Year honor at the conclusion of the tournament, an award that he felt deserved to go to all of his players and coaches. Yarworth downplayed the award and said he was just incredibly pleased with the end result.

"It was really gratifying after all we had been through to be able to perform that well and they did a tremendous job," Yarworth said. "We swam tough, we swam hard, and everyone contributed. It was a team effort and I said before the match that was the key to winning this tournament."

Yarworth certainly was right, as the Massachusetts men's swim team took home the title and is still undefeated.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — Your creative flair and practical know-how attract positive feedback. Avoid taking risks with other people's money; rely on experts' advice. Behind-the-scenes development may prove lucky for you.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — Keep spending under control. Positive influences help you solve a personal problem. Evening could be the happiest time of day. Nurture romance.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Take the lead today and get things going just the way you planned. Some interesting developments will take place this afternoon. Find ways to economize. You want more money coming in than going out.

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — Be willing to change your plans. A loved one's needs outweigh your own. Put your interests on hold and lend a hand. Friends offer to help out in an emergency. Show your heartfelt appreciation.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Guard against mix-ups which could result in annoyance or extra expense. Keep pushing a pet cause while you have access to prominent people. Voice your gratitude if friends show you a good time.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Your partner or closest friend holds the key to settling a dispute. An increase in financial activity is indicated. Accept what cannot be helped. You need to learn from your mistakes, then move on.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Higher-ups take notice when you showcase your talents. Learn from a parent's experiences. Friends are eager to get together and celebrate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — A misplaced item is found in old clothing or behind a piece of furniture. Keep a diary of important events. Be supportive of relatives who have dedicated their lives to a noble cause.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — A brainstorming session with allies could result in a clever idea or useful agreement. Turn your attention to your private life. Lovers will see eye-to-eye.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — Your enthusiasm is contagious now. Others are ready to help you do good works! Take someone's "friendly advice" with a grain of salt. Trust your strong inner voice. A love relationship will gradually deepen.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — A music program or holistic health treatment captures your attention. Maintain your composure even if co-workers get hot under the collar. All bets are off where a business deal is involved. Avoid watching the clock.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — A discussion which could have far-reaching effects should not be postponed. A parent greatly influences your thoughts and actions. Someone's romantic intentions need to be clarified. Accept well-intentioned advice with good grace.

There was this little black girl on the street near my house and she was crying softly. I don't know what happened to her.
She wouldn't stop crying. Then I started to cry and my friend Benny started to cry. We cried for ten minutes then this old lady across the street started to cry. And her dog even looked like he was crying.
Pretty soon everybody on the street was crying. I think people on the next street were crying. Maybe the whole world was crying.
I couldn't stop crying.
Somebody must have taken something very important from that little girl.
But, I feel pretty good today.

Seniors honored in Minutewomen's season finale

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Four seniors will bid farewell to the William D. Mullins Center tonight, when the Massachusetts women's basketball team closes out its regular season against Rhode Island.

Before the game the Massachusetts seniors who will be playing in their final home game will be honored. The seniors are Melissa Gurile, Octavia Thomas, Tricia Hopson and Nicole Carter.

The Minutewomen (18-8, 10-5 Atlantic 10) are returning to the Mullins Center after a three game road trip, which saw them pound Fordham and Dayton, before falling to St. Bonaventure.

The Lady Rams (20-5, 13-2) triumphed over Temple and George Washington at home to lead up to the meeting with Massachusetts. With the win over Temple, Rhode Island clinched the Eastern Division title, and guaranteed itself a one seed in next weekend's A-10 Tournament.

Massachusetts, currently ranked No. 2 in the Eastern Division and vying for a second seed in the A-10s, can cap off a perfect season at home with a victory tonight. The Minutewomen haven't lost in the Mullins Center since last February, going 11-0 at home this season.

The main task for the UMass squad will be to shut down All-America candidate Dayna Smith, who is leading the Lady Rams in several categories this season.

Smith holds top team honors in assists (196 on the season), steals (79), and blocks (8). Smith also holds URI records for assists, three- pointers made, three-pointers attempted, and she is second in steals. Last week, Smith was named Player of the Week for the A-10.

The Minutewomen are led by Thomas, who is averaging 17.2 points per game and 6.7 rebounds per game. Leading the team with Thomas is fellow senior Melissa Gurile who is recording 14.7 ppg and a team-leading 6.9 rpg.

Crystal Carroll has stepped up to be a major contributor for the Minutewomen in the past few games, averaging 12.3 ppg. With 18 points Carroll was the high scorer against Fordham, and with 19 she took that honor against Dayton. Carroll is also pulling down an average of 5.5 rpg.

For URI, Smith is backed by forward Tasha King, who is averaging 18.0 ppg and 7.8 rpg. Jaime Gray plays the other forward, and is currently holding averages of 13.3 ppg and 6.9 rpg. The Lady Rams center, Erin Fuller, has been chipping in for 9.0 ppg and pulling down 6.5 rpg.

In this season's earlier match-up between the two teams, the Lady Rams pulled out a 86-74 victory. Led by King, who scored 19 points, Rhode Island took advantage of Massachusetts' early-game foul trouble and poor three-point shooting.

URI shot 10-18 from beyond the arc, while UMass went 1-7 from bonus range. The UMass trio of Thomas, Gurile, and Carroll, who all faced fouls early in the game, combined for 65 of the Minutewomen's 74 points.

Minutemen capture Atlantic 10 Title

By Jay Warner
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's swim coach Russ Yarworth walked around his office on Monday sporting a stylish haircut and expressing anger towards his squad.

The Minutemen won their first-ever Atlantic 10 Championship title this past weekend and fulfilling a promise he made to his team last season, they had the honor of giving the coach a very close trim.

"I promised them at the end of last season if they won the Atlantic-10 title they could cut my hair," Yarworth said. "I've got a good group of kids except for the ones who shaved my head, which was all of them, so they're all a bunch of rascals."

Despite the fact that he was practically bald, Yarworth could not have asked for a better outcome.

They entered the tournament with high expectations for themselves and did not disappoint. At the conclusion of each day of the three- day championship, Massachusetts was leading the field, finishing with 820.50 points, 53 points ahead of second- place LaSalle.

Yarworth stressed the fact that, although the Minutemen had swimmers winning events, the team as a whole was crucial to the win.

"You can choose individuals, but this was indeed a team effort because every kid that went there scored in at least one event. That is how you win championship meets," Yarworth said. "They all felt like they contributed and were part of the team."

The team entered the tournament with little knowledge of what to expect from the other teams. George Washington had been chosen in the pre-season as the favorite for the title, and the Minutemen knew that there was little room for error over the entirety of the three-day event.

"Intensity was up, definitely, especially after the first day," said tri-captain Dave Laporte. "We were up after that first day and we never looked back."

As could be expected, senior tri-captain Keith McLarty, sophomore Sean Anderson and freshman Geoff Gear all turned in strong performances, but the surprise of the meet turned out to be freshman Brian Wisniewski.

Wisniewski swam the 100-yard butterfly in a time of :50.85, as well as being a member of the second place 200-yard medley relay team that finished in a school record time of 1:33.42.

"Brian did really well and probably had the best meet out of all of us," Laporte said. "He has been doing well all year but he dropped a lot of time off his best times. His performance stands out the most in my mind."

Anderson continued to dominate his opponents as he and Gear played vital roles in the final day of the meet.

Anderson won the 100-yard freestyle with a time of :45.86, while Gear placed second in the 200-yard fly with a personal best time of 1:51.90. Each event earned crucial points on the closing day of the meet.

In addition, Gear and Anderson joined Wisniewski and junior Mark Collier to form the third place 400-yard freestyle relay team in the final event of the competition, finishing in a time of 3:07.75. McLarty broke his own school record, set only a year ago, in the 400-yard individual medley with a time of 3:58.21.

Yarworth was quick to mention other individuals that weren't necessarily stars but did place well enough to earn significant points that played a decisive role in the outcome. Among them were senior John Luviano, senior Justin Murphy, freshman B.J. Brannon and freshman David Koritkoski.

Women's gymnastics vaults over Eagles

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's gymnastics team is rivalling the philosophy department as the deepest organization on campus, and last night at Curry Hicks Cage they showed why.

Despite the absences of senior co-captain J.J. Tolhurst (ankle) and freshman Michelle LoPresti (heel), the Minutewomen utilized their plentiful resources to edge out a win over a strong Eastern Michigan squad, 190.525 to 190.175.

UMass, ranked 16th in the nation, improved to 3-4 overall in its first of three straight home meets, thanks in part to a dramatic final floor routine.

"The kids that performed tonight had an incredible day," coach Dave Kuzara said. "We used all of our depth to do the job and won a meet we weren't necessarily expecting to win. The key today was Tara and Lianne in the all-around. They just did outstanding.

"But what made the difference was Rokia [Madore] on vault, Penny [LeBeau] on bars, Anita [Sanyal]'s beam routine and the first three girls on the floor routine. Even those who didn't score so high helped to set up the other people in the lineup by doing well."

Junior Tara Swartz led all competitors in the all-around for UMass, with a score of 38.575, with junior Lianne Laing close behind with a 38.400.

Kim Miller led the Eagles with an all-around finish of 38.100.

On the vault, Laing tied her personal and team season-high score with a 9.85.

Denise Johnson (9.775) and Swartz (9.750) came in second and third in the meet, respectively.

As for the bars, the multi-talented Swartz took this event, with a team season-high of 9.875.

The previous mark of 9.825 also belonged to Swartz. Eastern Michigan's Heather Shire finished second with a 9.70, while Johnson earned a 9.65.

UMass' Sanyal registered a 9.75 on the beam to claim first place, while Eagle Lisa Fleming scored a 9.65 for second place, and teammate Christine Holik managed a 9.60, good for third.

The crowd at the cage was simply dazzled by Laing's floor routine, and apparently so were the judges, as they gave the Ottawa native a 9.9. Fleming and Miller of EM tallied a 9.85 and 9.825, respectively.

The Minutewomen's next two meets are against New Hampshire on Sunday, March 3, and then again on the following Friday against Bridgeport.

"Tonight we had to compete with what was available," Kuzara said. "Our backs were really against the wall, but we were able to come through. Everyone truly did a great job, no question."

Ruth Reeves shown performing her floor exercised scored a 9.35 in the decisive event which enabled the Minutewomen to win the meet by .325 of a point.

Women's swimming takes third at A-10s

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

If you looked at the list of goals that the Minutewomen had drawn up at the beginning of the year, you would have seen one that said third place at the Atlantic 10 Championships. This past weekend in Buffalo, N.Y. they accomplished just that, coming away with a 489 points, good for third out of the nine schools attending the meet.

St. Bonaventure topped the list running away with first accumulating 683 points. George Washington was second with 557. UMass beat out Virginia Tech by just eight points finishing with 481. LaSalle was fifth, Duquesne sixth, then Rhode Island, Fordham, and last was Xavier with a dismal 144 points.

The Minutewomen swam considerably well in this meet, and they had to do it without the support of their coach Bob Newcomb. Newcomb was in Virginia tending to his father who was in the hospital, and later passed away on the first day of the meet.

"They're a very mature and motivated group of kids and they did a great job," said Russ Yarworth, head coach of the men's team. "It was a good performance under tough conditions. You can't ask these kids to do more than what they did."

UMass was in fourth place after the first day, fifth after the second, and made up the ground on the final day of competition to come away with third.

Senior Sarah Baker put the finishing touches on a incredible season for her and the team, leading UMass with a third place finish in the 100-yard freestyle event with a season best time of :52.80. Baker, along with junior Jessica Farley, freshman Amy Mullen and junior Kristin Schambach swam to a third place finish in the 400-yard freestyle relay in 3:35.34, also a season best time. Junior Barbara Hickey came away with a fourth place finish in the 1650-yard freestyle with a time of 17:23.32.

"It was a great team meet," said assistant coach Joelle Dold. "We were very consistent and we had a lot of strong swims."

St. Bonaventure took numerous first place finishes, two of them included Lisa Balzer in the 200-yard breaststroke, and Kelly Hogan in the 100-yard freestyle, with her teammate Anna Bellisveu right behind her.

"They were outstanding," Dold said. "They have some great swimmers. We discovered how competitive the A-10 is now." Diving proved strong again as Angelique Rodriguez came in third in the three meter diving event, and fifth in the one meter contest.

"She dove great against a couple of really talented girls from Virginia Tech, and LaSalle," said diving coach Guy Pollino. "She really stood her ground and what really made her standout was that she dove better in the final round than the preliminary round."

Krystin Carpenter came in 13th and 15th in the one and three meter events respectively. "That was great for her," Pollino said. "Especially the one meter event because that was a tougher contest."

Kim Schadt pulled off two 16th place finishes in both events out of 26 divers to finish in the points.

UMass' season will come to an end with its 6-2 dual meet record, second place at New Englands, and third in the A-10 Championships.

"This season we've really came together," Dold said. "We have some great swimmers and they did an outstanding job."

Student Union evacuated after laundry room fire

■ Quick response prevented any injuries after malfunctioning dryer ignites rags

Firefighters Rollie Brier, left, and Jim Snowden dump the smoldering remnants of the laundry room fire that caused an evacuation of the Student Union yesterday afternoon.

By Daniel Sullivan

The basement of the Student Union was evacuated yesterday afternoon due to a small fire in the laundry room.

A preliminary investigation revealed the fire started in a gas dryer at 1:55 p.m. and was caused by a malfunction, according to Donald Erickson, of Environmental Health and Safety.

"It was a combination of things that happened," said Erickson. "Gas dryers tend to be hotter, not being a full load and being a load of small items, and the fact that we've had problems with that dryer in the past overheating. It all came together at once. Basically it was a malfunction."

Al Holzhauer, a worker in the laundry room first noticed the flames coming from the dryer. He pulled the fire alarm, turned off the electricity through a fuse box and then opened the dryer door to put out the fire.

"The dryer got too hot and ignited the rags inside," Holzhauer said.

The flames were quickly extinguished, but smoke filled the area. People in the Hatch, Craft Shop, Games Room and surrounding area were evacuated immediately.

"I got everyone out of the building in about five minutes," said Tim O'Hara, a building operations worker.

O'Hara is an active fire-fighter for the Hadley Fire Department. He said things went smoothly as about 500 people left through four emergency exits.

A second worker in the laundry room, Peter Zere, said no one else was near the dryers. He said minutes after the alarm was pulled a fire truck responded.

"We have fire drill in the spring once a year after the semester has ended," O'Hara said.

University Police, Environmental Health and Safety workers and the Amherst Fire Department responded to the fire. One fire truck arrived to contain the smoke.

No one complained of immediate health problems caused by the smoke, according to Erickson.

"My staff responded well to the situation in knowing what to do," said Meredith Schmidt, the hotel manager. "Erickson trains my staff once per semester."

Erickson said, "It is not unusual what happened. A lot of places like this have these kinds of problems."

Gas dryers used in the laundry room cost between $6,000 to $8,000. The faulty dryer has had problems overheating in the past and was repaired. Driers are checked every day and are monitored at all times, according to Erickson.

"They may pull that drier completely now," said Holzhauer, "because of the problems we've had with it."

"It's hard to monitor," said Erickson. "Usually when you realize there is a problem, it is too late."

MASSPIRG urges student to vote, take part in national campaigns today

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Student Public Interest Group (MASSPIRG) will be holding a student primary vote today.

Students may vote between 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Student Union and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. in the dining commons.

MASSPIRG is involved with a national movement called the Youth Vote Campaign. The goals of the campaign are to register student voters, poll them on their choice for president and collect input about student issues.

"We are trying to raise political awareness on campus," said junior Jen Mueler. "We want to show politicians that students are interested in politics."

The Youth Vote Campaign attempts to unify students to make them aware of political issues and then emphasize proactive changes in politics.

"In 1992 we registered a record breaking number of students here at the University. We hope to do the same in our Youth Vote Campaign," Mueler stated.

The MASSPIRG campaign will register voters for the fall. "We need to mobilize the students as a voting block in order to gain more legitimacy and attention from politicians," Mueler said.

Students will be voting on issues which they feel are important to themselves and their peers. The top issues will then be released to the press to inform politicians of students' concerns.

Issues important to the student body include a Congressional $5 billion reduction to higher education, the Campus Gag Rule which threatens to undermine students' rights to organize, state attacks on higher education and the right of students' to organize and potential roll-backs in 25 years of environmental reform.

"We are trying to get politicians to realize what is going on," said MASSPIRG campus organizer Jay Rasku. "Hopefully, the candidates will respond by addressing the issues which students find important."

"We need to mobilize the students as a voting block in order to gain more legitimacy and attention from politicians." — Jen Mueler, MASSPIRG

Thirty-five other colleges within New England will be participating in the Youth Vote Campaign.

The Youth Vote Campaign addresses the lower-than- average number of 18 to 24-year-old voter in 1994, according to a MASSPIRG fact sheet.

After the student primary, MASSPIRG will be organizing informal forums in which speakers will further inform students about issues affecting them.

MASSPIRG is also hoping to bring an official voting poll to the University.

"About two years ago the town of Amherst gave us permission for the poll. It is now time to pursue this goal," said Mueler. "The poll will make it much easier for students to vote."

Rasku stated, "It is so important for students to get out and vote or else no one will listen to us."

Students claim Mullins not accessible

By Daniel Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Three disabled students are considering filing a complaint against the University of Massachusetts Disability Service and Ticket Agency for failing to provide proper seating during men's basketball games.

Three handicapped individuals, who said they will file the complaint if nothing is done, are scheduled to meet with Madeline Peters, director of Disability Services and Thorr Bjorn, athletic ticket director, Monday afternoon.

"We will work on finding space for the St. Joseph's game and for next season," Bjorn said.

The students said they have wanted to talk with Bjorn in person, but his office is inaccessible to wheel chairs.

The William D. Mullins Center was designed to have space for approximately 80 disability individuals, according to Howard Weinstein, a junior sport management major. He said 30 seats are available for students, allowing ample room for the 25 UMass students in wheel chairs. However, handicapped students are displaced from center court seats to sit behind the basket when fans arrive.

"Section Z [the end zone] is higher up," said Weinstein. "When students stand up, we can't see anything because being in a wheel chair, we are lower to the ground."

Mullins Center provided adequate seating for disability students during other events, according to junior Kevin Gallant. Weinstein and Gallant said there is a lot of miscommunication within the ticket agency for basketball games.

For example, disabled student tickets were not in the ticket office when Weinstein went for pick-up. Instead of going to get the proper ticket, Weinstein was given a general admission ticket without "student" stamped on it. While at the game, he was told to go to Patron's Services to fix the situation since he lacked a student general admission ticket.

"During the Wake Forest game, I was sitting in the student section and was asked to leave because the seat was 'reserved for season ticket holders,'" said Christina Zizza. "I was told that I either had to leave the building or I would be arrested. When I go to a game, I want to be able to enjoy it and not worry about moving, because I am a regular student."

Zizza, Weinstein and Gallant then went to Disabilities Services.

"Three weeks ago I talked to Madeline Peters, director of Disability Services, to schedule a meeting," said Weinstein. "Nothing happened until she heard that I was going to the Collegian and she decided to get off her butt and do something."

"It became a real concern that I was not aware of," said Bjorn. "I thought that we were doing a great job accommodating the students — we are not. I don't know what all the problems are."

Weinstein said, "If I am the first student in the Mullins Center, I still can't choose my seat. The hot seats — behind the players' seats — I don't have the luxury to sit there. I must go halfway up to disability seats. When the seats are filled, I am more limited to the end zone seats."

Bjorn said he "didn't know there was an issue and you know what, we found out there was a strong issue. Is there something we can do better? Yes."

Weinstein wants to use knowledge learned in sport management classes to help find a solution. He acknowledges the problem won't be easy to fix, but will work with Bjorn.

"We want to rectify the problem not just for us, but for any students in the future," Gallant said.

Peters could not be reached for comment.

Forbes earns Arizona primary win

By John King
Associated Press

Flat-tax champion Steve Forbes captured Arizona's winner-take-all primary yesterday, shocking Pat Buchanan and Bob Dole to seize an improbable lead in the turbulent Republican presidential race. Stung in the night's showdown contest, Dole took some solace in winning North and South Dakota.

For Forbes, the dramatic Arizona win meant back-to-back victory celebrations after disappointing fourth-place showings in Iowa and New Hampshire had his candidacy in jeopardy.

The publishing heir won Delaware's primary Saturday, and used that boost — and another major personal investment in TV ads — to surge past Buchanan and Dole in the final weekend of Arizona campaigning.

Forbes was ecstatic with his victory. "We believe deeply that America has the potential for the greatest economic boom and spiritual renewal in its history," he told cheering supporters in Phoenix.

"A week ago they wrote our obituary," he said. "Now tonight we can perhaps write the obituary of conventional political punditry in America."

Buchanan could only be disappointed. He drew enthusiastic crowds throughout the final weekend and asserted an Arizona win would make him the clear front-runner. Instead, he came away empty handed heading into Saturday's showdown in South Carolina.

Dole flatly predicted a South Carolina victory, and the contest shapes up as his last best chance to launch a turnaround. Forbes trails way back in South Carolina, while Buchanan has been inching up. Dole left no doubt he considered the more conservative Buchanan the bigger threat in the South.

With one-third of Arizona's vote tallied, Forbes was leading with 36 percent, Buchanan and Dole were battling for second; exit polling suggested Buchanan had the edge.

Lamar Alexander was a dim afterthought on the first multi-state primary day of the muddled GOP campaign and some leading Dole supporters said it was time for the former Tennessee governor to get out of the way.

Yesterday's results put Forbes well ahead in the Associated Press delegate count, with 60 to far. Buchanan had 37 and Dole 36, while Alexander had 10 delegates.

A candidate needs 996 delegates to win the Republican nomination and the success of the anti-establishment candidates sparked talk in Republican circles yesterday of a contested convention.

The dramatic comeback gave Forbes improbable momentum in the nomination chase, with a critical, crowded stretch of primaries

Students hold candlelight vigil

By Adam Buxbaum
Collegian Correspondent

On Monday night, at 7 p.m. 40 Jewish University of Massachusetts students gathered at Hillel House to pay tribute to the 27 victims of the two bombings that took place in Israel last Sunday.

The candlelight vigil was the first vigil at Hillel since last November when students held a memorial after the assassination of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

As Jewish students gathered together in commemoration of the lives lost in the bombing, they sang songs and lit candles on the steps in front of Hillel House. First-year student Elena Silverman led the vigil which was sponsored by Zionists for Action, a political pro-Israel group.

Silverman, an active member of Hillel and of Young Judea, a Jewish youth group, who recently returned from spending a significant amount of time in Israel, felt the grief of many Israelis after learning about the explosions. Silverman encouraged UMass students to share their feelings and alleviate the pain. The vigil was concluded by the singing of the Hatikvah, the Jewish prayer of mourning.

Kim Richman, the resident assistant of the Jewish Living Community at Hillel House said, "Although this is a devastating event for Israelis, as well as people around the world, we can not allow terrorism to obstruct the developing peace in the Middle East."

Last Sunday two Arab fundamentalists allegedly disguised themselves as Israelis and carried out a suicide bombing which destroyed two commuter buses. The first explosion, at 6:48 a.m. on Sunday, ripped apart crowded city bus No. 18 on Jaffa Road in downtown Jerusalem. Twenty-five people died and another 85 were wounded, 16 in serious condition, police said. Two Jewish American students, Matthew Eisenfeld and Sarah Duker were amongst those who were killed.

The second bombing occurred less than an hour later in Ashkelon, a coastal town south of Jerusalem, and killed two people. The bombers were among those killed in both attacks.

The two bombings made for the worst day of terrorism in Israel since 1978. A calm had been settling over the country after six months with no attacks.

The Islamic fundamentalist group Hamas claimed responsibility for the actions saying it was in retaliation for the killing of Yehiya Ayyash a master bombmaker known as "the Engineer" on Jan.5 by Israeli agents.

Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres said, "I know deep in my heart that on the way to peace we shall have to pay a heavy toll for it."

What is your take on the outcome of the New Hampshire primary?

"Actually, I'm happy Buchanan won the Republican race because he's too far right to win the national election. So Clinton would be in again."

Johannah Henson
senior, German
Morristown, N.J.

"It shows there are no more liberals in the party and the moderates are too divided, so the conservatives are grabbing power."

Carlton Borden
sophomore, history
Glen Ridge, N.J.

"It really sort of scares me and shows how ridiculously conservative the Republican party has become. I think it shows that good things are going to happen in November because Bill Clinton is going to win the election."

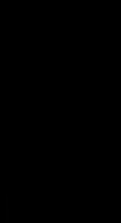
Bob Brady
senior, political science/history
Kingston

"I think it's pretty frightening that Buchanan came out ahead because he's so conservative and I don't think that's what the country needs right now."

Ernestina Mateiro
sophomore, undeclared
Providence, R.I.

"Honestly neither Buchanan nor Dole appeals to me, so the results don't really mean much to me. I'm more in support of Clinton than anybody. I think he's done as fine a job as any president thus far."

Josephus Housey, Jr.
junior, communications
Springfield



"What I think is that Buchanan probably looks very good in the media right now because his speeches have had a lot of impact and people want to hear them. But his real motives are not being seen by the people who vote for him."

Mark Lloyd
junior, business management
McLean, Va.

just ahead. Party leaders anxious to see Buchanan blocked from the nomination would surely turn quick attention to the deep-pocketed Forbes' candidacy.

Dole carried North and South Dakota handily, and brushed aside his Sun Belt disappointment.

"We're back in the winning column," the Senate majority leader said. "It feels good."

"This is not a game," Dole said. "We're not electing a talk show host. We're electing the president of the United States."

Buchanan left Arizona early to focus down the road as well, staging an evening rally in Georgia, one of nine states with primaries next Tuesday.

"I'm simply the political instrument of a great movement in America," Buchanan said. Earlier, he said establishment Republicans attacked him at the party's peril. "We can bring the Reagan Democrats home," he said. "I can bring the Perot voters home, if the Republican Party will only open its door to a lot of folks who have been left out and have no voice."

In addition to his Arizona loss, there was more sobering news for Buchanan in yesterday's voters surveys.

Asked whether Buchanan was too extreme, half the voters in all three states answered yes and slightly fewer said no. Also, while Buchanan has tried to turn foreign trade into a top campaign issue, half the voters in Arizona and South Dakota and a little less in North Dakota said the free trade agreements created jobs.

A majority of voters in Arizona cited taxes as their top concern, and flat-tax advocate Forbes, who spent more than $4 million on TV ads in Arizona alone, won much of their support. In the Dakotas the deficit mattered most, followed by taxes and jobs. In South Dakota, with 98 percent of precincts counted, Dole had 45 percent of the vote, Buchanan 29 percent, Forbes 13 and Alexander 9.

With 94 percent of North Dakota precincts counted, Dole had 42 percent of the vote, Forbes 20 percent and Buchanan 19 percent. Alexander was fifth with 6 percent, trailing Sen. Phil Gramm, who dropped out of the race two weeks ago but was on North Dakota's mail-in ballots.

The Real World, San Francisco

The streets in San Francisco are thick. Thick with tourists and thick with the homeless.

In this beautiful city of seafood, hills and gingerbread houses, homelessness is a painful reminder.

Everywhere I go there are homeless men and women, shaking grimy styrofoam coffee cups with the Dunkin' Donuts logo long worn off. Some offer a song, some offer a riddle, some offer the homeless newspaper, some offer religion, some offer to work for food, some stand as still as a mannequin and one offers me a sign language alphabet, all for some spare change.

Liberal guilt overwhelms me — back at home in Amherst, homelessness isn't visible. If it is, I choose not to see it. Here in San Francisco, I can not walk a block without seeing someone down on their luck. Every corner finds someone doing something in order to "make a living."

I was homeless too, but the lives of these people and their experiences are so far removed from me, that I am not connected to what is happening around me.

The bank machine outside our hotel has the same two men sitting there every evening. In the mornings they are never there. Leaned against a row of paper stands, one man, whose only identification is a cardboard sign that reads, "Starving Artist," obsessively sketches, his face turned down, concentrating on whatever it is that he is drawing. The top of his head bobs up and down in front of a magazine rack that holds Boobs magazine. The woman on the cover appears as if she is offering her enormous breasts to this grimy homeless artist who never acknowledges the existence of an outside world beyond his sketch pad.

His partner is the exact opposite, talking, joking, giving directions. He makes sure that everyone who uses the ATM machine takes their receipt. He reminds and scolds them that someone could take their receipt and have access to their account. Sadly, he helps everyone who walks by, but they never help him.

I wonder where they go in the morning — probably to a homeless shelter or a park, scrounge up some food and coffee, getting just enough sustenance to survive.

Everywhere I go there are homeless men and women, shaking grimy styrofoam coffee cups, the Dunkin' Donuts logo long worn off. Some offer a song, some offer a riddle, some offer the homeless newspaper, some offer religion, some offer to work for food, some stand as still as a mannequin and one offers me a sign language alphabet, all for some spare change.

Marni E. Helfner

Some of the homeless people I encounter have given up; they sit there holding their sign, jangling their cup, huddled in a blanket. Some feel the need to prove they will work for spare change, dancing, singing, juggling.

The anger I feel originates from the dignity these people have lost. They weren't the ones who lost it, people have taken it away from them. Lost jobs, mental illness, runs of bad luck, have left all these people on the streets of the big city. Perhaps they came here, hoping to make money to send home, perhaps this is where they landed when they had no place to go.

In Amherst, the two or three obviously homeless people are shunned, perhaps more so than in San Francisco. Asked to move from the benches on Pleasant Street, carrying bags of returnables, harassed by drunk college students, these people are treated like trash, rather than human beings.

The humanity that college students and Amherst liberals would like to believe they have seems to have vanished in the face of poverty, their kindness disappears when downtown doesn't look as pretty with dirty homeless people.

Apparently, it's not illegal to be homeless in San Francisco, most of the homeless are left alone by the police and tourists. The difference between here and Amherst is the obviousness of poverty. Here, you see it on every block — the ravages and results of capitalism. In Amherst, two or three homeless people are easily overlooked.

But how can one overlook another human being?

On the corner of Haight and Ashbury Streets, the corner of the '60s, dozens of young and old homeless gather in front of Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream. The cops shove them along, moving them away from the entrance. As hip and cool as Ben & Jerry's wants you to think they are, they're still corporate enough to move people from out of in front of their store.

I don't know what to do. I am a tourist that doesn't want to continue the hierarchy of tourism anymore. I am racked with the guilt of being someone who was homeless and isn't anymore. I don't know what to do anymore; give change, donate to charitable groups, give someone a sandwich.

Working it out

Considering how lazy we college students are supposed to be, we do an awful lot of work.

This realization came to me this afternoon when I was, you guessed it, at work. Slogging away at assembling the 700 exams needed for a certain class run through the department that employs me, I overheard the following conversation:

Student: I need to schedule a makeup exam
Administrative assistant: Why?
Student (obviously humbled): Because I have a full-time job.
Administrative assistant (with admirable patience): What hours?
Student: Four to nine thirty.
Administrative assistant: Alright, name, please?

Then a second conversation, very similar to this one. Then a third. One student explained that he had gotten a job in New York this coming Thursday that might run in to Friday. Was there a way he could squeeze in the exam some other time?

Looking at the eight billion copies I was in the process of making, I felt real sympathy for these students. I also felt somewhat grateful.

At least my job has decent hours. At least I don't have nasty exams and science labs I have to schedule in between all-night shifts at D.P. Dough or Dairy Mart. And at least I don't really need the money.

Some people really do need the money, whether to pay their way through school, cover the rent, take car of auto insurance, or just dig themselves out of debt.

Me, I just need it to buy the food that keeps me alive now that I'm off the "meal" plan. And then the incidental expenses: copies, typing paper, bus tickets, various personal care products, and, yes, the occasional CD. It could be worse.

Take my roommate, for instance. She works thirty hours a week. This is with a 15-credit course load. Or my last roommate, who worked over twenty hours a week. With my current roommate, the ratio of time spent at work versus time in the classroom works out to be something around 2:1. What's with that? How in the world is this woman supposed to absorb what she's learning when she spends most of her time doing something totally unrelated to her studies? The answer, to me, seems obvious: she can't, and if she can't, then most students can't either. And yet they must.

There are good jobs you can have as a student, jobs that let you expand your mind, teach you things about the real world, and give you new skills. There are paid internships and student-run collectives and research assistant positions. Jobs that don't meddle in your studies, but make them better.

Wendy Darling

By and large, however, most students aren't lucky enough to find jobs like these. No, instead of being able to focus on going to class, attending exams, and doing their reading, they're stuck sweeping floors, sorting mail, and driving buses.

All kinds of mindless jobs are out there, just waiting for hapless, desperate college students to take them. Telemarketing, anyone?

Sigh. I wish there was something I could do about this, like maybe getting everyone loans or scholarships or just rigging the lottery somehow. But what can I do? I'm just a temporary clerical worker and, on the side, an opinion columnist (a position for which I, sadly, do not receive pay).

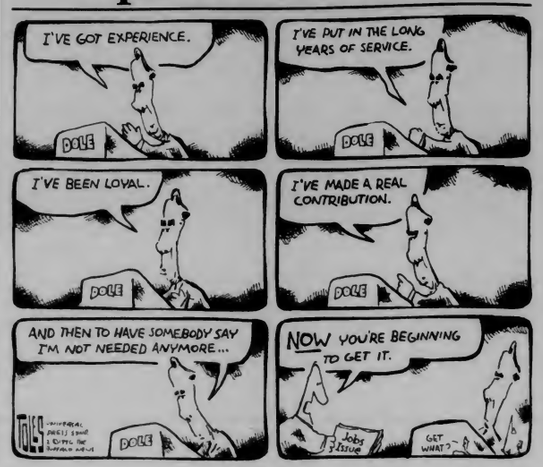
Opinion/Editorial



The Rachel issue

Apparently, the last haircut I got was a little too trendy, because the first thing people said to me was, "Oh, you got the 'Rachel.'"

It was then that I realized one of the best shows on television is becoming a major source of frustration for me.

I have yet to sit down and enjoy an episode of "Friends" without some guy raving about how sexy Jennifer Aniston is. Even my own father makes comments on how hot she is — right in front of his wife and daughters. Disgusting.

Now I can't even pick up a magazine without being subjected to Aniston in all of her glory — with her bare ass shining on the cover of Rolling Stone. Flip open to the middle and you'll find a shot of her in the hands-over-breasts pose which Janet Jackson made oh so famous last year.

I completely understand why so many men are obsessed with Aniston — or rather, her character Rachel. That's what scares me. Sure, she's got a great body (which she flounces around braless in every show), but we're not talking supermodel status here. She's found her niche as Rachel, but this is a woman with a humble acting background, including the "Ferris Bueller" television show bomb.

The thing that deludes me surrounds what I call the "Rachel mentality." Does she possess the type of personality that is truly attractive to men? Rachel is a ditzy, flaky, spoiled brat who works in a coffee shop and whines incessantly.

She's ultra-sensitive, gets upset at petty, insignificant things (Ross' little list, for example), and at the same time is a weak and vulnerable woman. Quite contrary to the basis of the show, Rachel is definitely not someone I would want to be friends with.

Though most men drool too heavily to elaborate on why Rachel is so attractive on-screen, a few of my male friends have offered their insights to my query.

According to one wide-eyed fan, Rachel is a girl he'd sleep with, Monica (the skinny brunette) is someone who he'd have as a girlfriend and Phoebe (the crunchy blonde) is just an interesting girl to hang out with.

Another guy told me he'd sleep with all three of them.

The overwhelming majority of men are choosing Rachel as their sex object of the month, hence the Diet Coke and Milk ads, and magazine covers galore. What also happens though, is the creation of an image that young girls see men desiring, and therefore will choose to emulate. They'll all want to be Rachel — the airhead with the famous hairdo and tiny little t-shirts. The most popular Friend who's basically only good for sex.

Laura Stock

They wouldn't want to be Monica — the somewhat anal- retentive, organized friend who's a workaholic. Nor would they want to be Phoebe — the spacy, animal rights supporting, folk singing, altruistic friend. Both of these women are good-looking too, but as the men have proven, it's the Rachel personality that is catching the flies.

The problem is, Rachel is a character who's basically powerless. In the "real world" where the rent for New York City studio apartment would require 10 coffee shop waitress' salaries, she'd be in serious trouble. With an attractive body and a repulsive personality, Rachel would wind up more of a victim than a vixen. What a role model.

For anyone who thinks I'm jealous of Aniston, you've missed the point. When people compared her to me, I was insulted, not complimented.

So as for my hairdo, I have dark brown hair, and bangs. It's the "Monica" — get it right.

Ultimate stupidity?

Picture this: two large, sweaty man wearing only tight black shorts, lying one on top of the other.

Got your attention?

O.K. Now how 'bout this: The one on top has his elbow across the bottom man's nose, pinning his head down on the floor. His free arm lifts up toward the ceiling, fingers clenched into a fist, in anticipation of another blow to the pinned man's head.

The expression on the attacker's blood-streaked face is animalistic, murderous, savage. It is impossible to tell who the blood on his hands and arms belongs to. His own has mixed with the dark red rivers streaming down his opponent's battered face...

Something from a horror movie? No, actually it is a scene from the Ultimate Fighting Championship (UFC) available for your viewing pleasure on pay-per-view for only $19.95. Entertaining sport or shameless display of barbaric masculinity at its worst? Well, I don't know...

As a macho-man, tough-guy, me-Tarzan-you-Jane hating woman, my first reaction to ultimate fighting is a stomach- wrenching nausea followed by a deep sigh and the muttered words, "Oh God, I hate men." But the more I found out and thought about the sport, the less positive I became about my initial judgements.

Nicole Cournoyer

Ultimate fighting is a contest between two man usually trained in one or more of the martial arts. Usually, the fighters blend one or two techniques together: wrestling, jujitsu, sambo, kick-boxing, etc. They fight in a thirty foot octagonal "ring" fashioned after a scene from Conan the Barbarian. (Oh boy...)

Sometimes called "no-rules fighting," it does in fact have a few—no biting, eye gouging, fish hooking (ripping the mouth), or kicking if you are wearing shoes. Originally, the referees were not allowed to stop a fight, but this policy changed when some fights got gruesome (one man received a gash in his forehead that required twenty-eight stitches to close).

Supporters of the sport, including the mastermind behind New York City's Semaphore Entertainment Group which runs the fights, Robert Meyrowitz, assert that safety is taken quite seriously. Apparently, no fighters have ever died in ultimate fighting as compared to the average four men a year killed in the boxing ring.

Because ultimate fighters try to avoid blows to the head which hurt their bare knuckles, less brain damage occurs than in boxing. Instead, they try to get their opponent into a submission lock or a choke and force him to tap the floor in surrender. Comparatively speaking, it doesn't sound so bad, does it?

The fighters are given a chance through this sport of being discovered and becoming models or actors... the next Arnold or Jean-Claude. The ancient Greeks, a people of great culture and high ideals, included no-rules combat, the pankration, in their Olympics. So how bad can it be?

Of course, Americans have the freedom and right to participate in and watch this sport if they choose to do so, but what does the fact that they do say about human nature? That we're all sick, twisted, blood-lusting animals at heart? That our culture tolerates, even embraces and fosters violence? Or that we simply need an outlet for our frustrations and anger, and barbarism on such a small, controlled level provides us with a safety valve? On the other hand, does watching such violence only immunize us against it so that we accept and perpetrate it in our own lives?

If you're not a fan, you may be wondering what kind of sick-o would watch this stuff. Well, here are a few examples: Robert Conrad, Brad Pitt, Leonardo DiCaprio, and Shaquille O'Neal. Change your opinion? Of the sport or of these people?

My point is that the fans of sports like ultimate fighting and boxing are not low-lifes or psychopaths. So why is one man beating another senseless so attractive to them?

Personally, I'm still repulsed by the outpouring of testosterone during these sports and the sickening publicity and commercialization surrounding them, but I'm not going to tell you what to watch.

Me, I'll stick to well-padded hockey players slamming each other against the boards. That's about as violent as I get.

Nicole Cournoyer is a Collegian columnist.

Behind the Wal

I have seen the face of modern day Evil and its name is — Wal-Mart.

I bet you thought I was going to say Bob Dole (Steve Forbes is evil too, but he's so goofy looking I can't take him seriously) or Hootie and the Blowfish, but the fact of the matter is, these two lamoes have nothing on the monstrous machine Wal-Mart has become.

Before you laugh and say "Oh, that silly Audette boy, he hates everything!," stop and think about it. Is there a Wal- Mart in your town? Is there a Wal-Mart in the towns surrounding yours? I'm willing to bet that the answer was "yes" on at least one account, if not both. Doesn't that scare anyone? Doesn't anyone see what is happening? Wal-Mart is looking to take over the world.

Oh sure, it looks innocent enough. All decked out in its pretty red, white and blue facade. To the non-observant eye the building looks like nothing more than another one-stop shopping store. But look closer. There is most definitely something inherently evil lurking behind all the patriotic hullabaloo. Stare at the building long enough and you will actually see it transform into the cold, grey stone prison that it actually is. You will feel it beckon you — "Come, oh upstanding American. Come to Wal-Mart for the greatest deals on useless junk. Don't worry we won't hurt you."

Ahhhh! I'm scaring myself.

For the longest time I was able to avoid the tempting ways of Wal-Mart thanks to the fact there wasn't one anywhere near where I lived. But then it came. It seemed to happen overnight. All of a sudden there were Wal-Marts on either side of my small, humble hometown. We would never let them take root on our own soil, but they managed to barricade us in by setting up residence in two of the weaker surrounding towns. We were trapped, and it wasn't very long until both stores had sunk their claws into the unsuspecting residents of my hometown.

Still, I didn't feel any fear. So what if the hicks that lived down the street wanted to shop there — no skin off my nose. But then one day it happened. I traveled to my parents' house for a friendly "home from college" weekend to find them drooling in the living room, staring at a bunch of cheap products strewn about the floor.

"But then one day it happened. I traveled to my parent's house for a friendly "home from college" weekend to find them drooling in the living room, staring at a bunch of cheap products strewn about the floor."

Matt Audette

"Mom... Dad?" I whispered nervously.

They didn't respond at first, but then finally their glazed eyes met mine.

"Have you been to Wal-Mart, son? What great deals they have."

I screamed and fainted. Okay, maybe I'm being a bit dramatic, but there was no doubting that my family, once upstanding citizens with independent thoughts, had been sucked into the Wal-Mart propaganda.

Remaining strong, I swore that they would never get me. That is until Christmas Eve. I was sitting at home, watching television when I realized I didn't have any contact lens solution. It was almost midnight and it was evident that nothing was going to be open.

My dad turned to me and said, "Wal-Mart is open 24 hours during the Christmas season."

A chill ran through my spine. Even though the thought of stepping into that store made my stomach churn, I knew what I had to do. I got into my car and headed towards the Devil himself.

When I arrived, it became immediately apparent that the whole situation was worse than I ever imagined. Scuzzy white trash were entering and exiting the store at a rapid pace, all with crazed looks in their eyes. I stepped into the store and was greeted by a kind old lady clad in full Wal- Mart attire.

"Welcome to Wal-Mart," she said robotically.

I quickly stepped passed this Stepford grandmother and headed towards the eye care section. I looked around me — Wal-Mart food store, Wal-Mart toy section, even the Kathy Lee Gifford Collection of clothing. My head began to spin and for a brief moment I thought I was going to lose my lunch. But I had to move on. Slowly I trudged to the Wal- Mart drugstore section, passing women who were swearing at their 11 kids, men who had no teeth and smelled like motor oil and, worse yet, elderly that actually reeked of death.

I got my saline solution, quickly paid for it and headed back to the safety of my car. I escaped unharmed. I started my car and bolted, almost causing a three-monster truck pile-up.

I was safe, but unfortunately I can not say the same for much of my fellow man. Be strong Americans. Don't give in to the power of Wal-Mart. Instead, reject the store and its evil temptations and shop at a much finer and respectable American institution — like Ames.

Institutionalized

Last Saturday was the first of a two-part forum about prisons in the United States. It was pointed out that the imprisonment rate in our country has doubled in the last 10 years, yet the amount of crime has remained the same.

Each prisoner costs tax payers $30,000 a year, more than the annual tuition at any college. We call our prisons correctional institutions, but this is a misnomer. Our prisons are designed for punishment.

Previously, prisons had educational programs, but these are being done away with. What does a prisoner have to look forward to? Slave labor at best. But this only breeds resentment in the person being exploited. It is helpful to remember that most prisoners are not serving life sentences. Thus, they will return to our society to mingle with us. But our prisons no longer have educational programs, so prisoners re-enter society with no new positive skills.

Jed Curtis

Rather, they greet us with a bigger chip on the shoulder than when they were first incarcerated. They have been abused and exploited for slave labor in prison, which only makes them more resentful and likely to return to a life of crime.

It is interesting that the sudden increase of imprisonment rates in the United States coincides with the down-fall of the Soviet Union. During the Cold War it was very convenient for us to project our inner demons onto the Russians. Good and bad was clearly defined, and God was on our side. But now that the Soviet Union is gone, who will be the scapegoats for all that is rotten in our country? Blacks, Hispanics, welfare mothers, etc.

Rather than confront ourselves and our failures, we continue to look for an outer solution for our inner ills. In the past, we stock-piled nuclear bombs to protect us from evil, but failed to notice that the Russians were doing likewise. Who was the real demon? Now it is no longer popular to build nuclear bombs, but we have got to keep our economy afloat somehow, so we are investing in the penal system.

This is an attempt to patch up various holes in one fell swoop. We will launch a campaign to project our evil onto our lower class, which will justify hiring prison contractors, wardens, guards, police, etc. The money will flow and we will get rid of those pesky welfare recipients. But we will not get rid of them forever: most will inevitably return to society but they will have no socially-redeeming skills because we now invest in punishment rather than reform and education.

This is a typical example of our tendency to treat illnesses rather than prevent them. We have spent billions of dollars searching cures for cancer and AIDS, but practically none on educating ourselves about prevention.

Our "health care" system is designed to make money rather than prevent illness. When we consult a doctor she gives us medication which we would perhaps have never needed if we were educated on preventing our affliction. Purchasing this medication feeds money back to our corrupt "health care" system.

A similar situations exists in our prison system. If we invested our tax money into public education we would help our children to expand their horizons and learn socially redeeming skills. But instead we cut money from public education and funnel it towards new prisons to incarcerate our citizens after our school systems fail.

It is easy to criticize our system. This is a starting point, but solutions are needed. Our culture is on a collision course, and the signs are all around us. It is possible and common to pretend not to see these signs. But upon becoming conscious of the enormity of our situation it becomes impossible not to be bothered by what we have allowed to occur.

When this happens it becomes my moral and social duty to take action. This action need not be earth-shattering: it is sufficient to examine my own life and decide whether adjustments are needed. By doing this, I am fulfilling my bare minimum social obligation, the conscious cultivation of myself. After taking this step I can decide whether to extend my action into the public sphere.

Class struggle

There are as many ways a class can effect a student as there are reasons to take a class. Sometimes we are intrigued, sometimes revolted by what we encounter. Other times the instructor is so incredibly somnolent that your head hitting the desk is the only thing that can wake you up.

I would like to believe that it is the goal of every professor to challenge and inspire students. But unfortunately I know this is not always the case. In high school there were many classes in which I took no notes, did no reading and still managed to do OK. I passed not because of luck or cheating, but because I had learned in other classes the skills which were necessary to succeed. There were a few decent high school teachers who realized that education is not rote memory, but original, creative thought based on experience.

Daniel E. Levenson

Like high school, I am finding that here at the University of Massachusetts there is a mixed bag as far as teaching style and technique go. While some of my classes are engaging, others leave me in a bleary-eyed, comatose state where I can feel my hair grow as the eons tick by. While I know why I'm taking the interesting classes, the question of why I am taking the drool-inducers still wanders through my brain now and then.

Sometimes classes can have a strange effect on students. Any classes involving medicine and the body can send people running to University Health Services wondering if they have somehow contracted Ebola or Anthrax from eating at the dining hall. (I wonder if you can get ulcers from Whitmore?)

Of course one of the worst effects a class can have on someone is to make that person hate a subject. I am no great fan of mathematics and I can't help but wonder if that has something to do with the mind-numbing math classes I endured in years past. As for now, I am a refugee from the world of calculators and complex equations. And I intend to keep this status until the university hunts me down and forces me to take a class in the cursed subject. As depressing as the thought may be, there are probably thousands of teachers out there destroying someone's interest in everything from music to mathematics, English to engineering.

Of course the flip side to this is that there are also probably thousands of people out there who are enjoying things they never thought they would. Possibly because someone took the time to make it interesting. There is one indisputable factor in determining how well a class will be received by student. The passion with which the instructor teaches is paramount to the students' benefiting from that class. I don't mean interest, or humor, but passion.

If you really want to grab someone's attention then you have to make them understand that you absolutely believe in what you are telling them. You must encourage these people to take what you have told them and apply It to the world around them, as well as to come up with original ideas on their own. While much of what I learned in boring classes has faded from my mind, a lot of what is important has, thankfully, stayed with me.

Just as the effects of bad education are easy to spot, the benefits of good education often shine. It is not the individuals who are experts in memorization that rule the world, but people who have the ability to make some sense of the world around them. It is the difference between creating mindless drones and productive leaders.

Already this semester I can tell which classes I am going to like a lot, and which classes I will find to be slightly less than enjoyable. Well, I guess that sometimes you have to take the good with the bad. Remember to keep what's important and leave the rest behind. Maybe that'll keep me awake the next time I start to nod off in class. I guess I'll just have to wait and sleep (oops, I meant see.)

IMAGINE YOURSELF IN A BIG, COMFY BED ON A WARM, CLOUDLESS NIGHT, MAKING LOVE WITH SOMEONE WHO IS PASSIONATELY IN LOVE WITH YOU.
AS YOU TOUCH AND HUG EACH OTHER TENDERLY YOU FEEL TRULY HAPPY AND COMPLETELY AT PEACE.
YOU BEGIN TO LOSE YOURSELF IN LOVE AND SENSUALITY. YOU ARE FUSED WITH YOUR LOVER.
YOU ARE IN PARADISE. YOU ARE WITH THE PERFECT PERSON. YOU ARE ALIVE.
YOUR TWO HEARTS BEAT AS ONE.
YOU ARE DEEPLY IN LOVE.
YOU LOVE YOUR LOVER. YOU LOVE YOURSELF. YOU LOVE LIFE.
SO TRY NOT TO SPOIL THE MOMENT.
OH, IT'S YOU.
SAME TO YOU AND MORE OF IT, PAL.

Nike University

Psst! Hey, son, wanna sign up for a School of Ed. class?"

Rob recoiled in horror from the gaunt figure that stretched its arms out towards him. Brad and Bill, catching him as he stumbled into them, laughed. "Just ignore them," said Brad and then yelled at the figure. "Loser!"

They walked into the room that held class registration for the fall semester. Rob, shaken, asked the guys, "Who was that?"

Bill looked at Rob. "It's your first year here at Nike University, isn't it, Bob?" Rob nodded. "Well, Nike runs its class registration by the new 'merit system.' Teachers get paid on commission!"

Just then they were approached by a grey-haired woman. "Gentlemen, wouldn't you like to learn a little bit about literature? We read great books in my English class..."

Ben Zeman

Brad interrupted her. "Salary?"

She faltered. "Well, it depends..."

He interrupted again. "Where's your sign?" Many departments had large signs advertising the starting salary their graduates could expect to make. Many were carrying the signs around the room and leading students to the tables.

"My sign, young man, is not as relevant as the books you can read..."

"Aaaah! She doesn't have a sign! P.C. Liberal!" they taunted, and she left, flustered. Bill and Brad high-fived each other, laughing.

Rob was puzzled. "When did this 'merit system' start?

"Yeah, isn't it great?" Brad enthused. "Before they tore down the old College of Arts and Sciences to build the Fine Arts Complex, and this place used to be called UMass, there was all kinds of chaos. Women and minorities wanted us all to take boring P.C. classes..."

"They called them 'diversity requirements'," smirked Bill.

"And there were all these departments leeching money from the ones that really made money, like Polymer Science and the Business School. Finally, they came out with 'the list' which separated departments into three categories — ones to be downsized, ones to be kept the same and ones to be added to." Brad paused for emphasis. "It was like a revolution! All the departments that got cut were useless ones like Latin American Studies and Women's Studies that didn't have any rich alumni anyway! The school started making more money after that, which is when President Bulger introduced the 'merit system' — faculty members getting paid by commission, corporate sponsors of universities, departments, even individual faculty members!"

Rob thought to himself for awhile as they passed eager professors trying to get their attention. Some were pleading with students, saying things like, "I only need three more students to have enough to feed my kids!" Some carried signs saying, "Will teach for food."

Rob looked further around the room — looming ahead were the registration complexes of Polymer Science, the Business School and all the wealthy departments. They had neon lights, a chorus line and were giving away all kinds of free merchandise.

"Guys, it looks like mostly white men here."

Brad and Bill stopped dead in their tracks and looked at Rob. "Well," Bill said hesitantly, "I guess the others just don't want to work as hard as we do. Back when we had welfare, they always..."

Rob interrupted, not convinced. "What if I wanted to learn about something else besides my own culture?"

Brad smiled and looked at Bill. "The freshman 151" they chorused together, and high-fived again. "You see," laughed Brad, "freshmen go through this when they first get here. We call it that 'cuz it usually takes them 15 minutes to realize where their stable financial future lies."

They approached the Polymer Science table, passing a neon sign saying "$110,000/yr." A smiling man in a sharp business suit greeted them. "Hey, guys, nice to see you again. Here to sign up for classes?"

Bill joked, "Only if you take Mastercard or Visa!"

The man quipped back. "We think plastic is fantastic! So who's the new guy?"

"This is Bob, our freshman hallmate from the Gap dorm."

"Brad, no!" interrupted Bill with mock seriousness. "He's a first-year student!" They both laughed and high-fived.

"Nice to meet you, Bob. Welcome to Nike University I'm Biff," said the man, shaking Rob's hand. "Why don't you give me your Visa and sign up for some classes?"

"My name's Rob, actually, not Bob. What course titles do you offer? Can I see the syllabus?"

Everyone got quiet. Biff and Brad looked uncomfortably at Biff. Biff frowned, then pointed to the $110,000 sign, saying, "There's your syllabus, Bob!"

Everyone laughed out loud, the tension relieved, and there were high-fives all around.

Down on his luck

For a brief moment, I thought he might go over the edge and try to hurt me. After all, he had served two tours of duty in Vietnam. What could a small college sophomore do to stop him? (Even though 19 was the average age of the American soldier in Vietnam.)

As long as I'd known him, my neighbor was a friendly outgoing person who would always have something to say about the New York Giants or the state of politics. Every week my parents would leave the Sunday classifieds for him in our mailbox, and on more than one occasion they gave him large amounts of food to take home. I just thought of him as a person down on his luck, never considering that he might be truly disturbed and imbalanced. Life had taught him nothing but torment and torture, so now he was projecting his anger back at the world and preaching it to me.

Bryan Schartzman

While still a teenager, he escaped an abusive and dysfunctional household by getting a baseball scholarship to a small mid-west college. When he dropped out he was drafted and sent to Vietnam where he "had to kill people."

When he got back to the United States he was given the same cold welcome that many returning veterans encountered. Protesters would gather outside his New York home carrying signs of "baby killer."

He describes the next 10 years as a "murky blur" sinking into heroin abuse and homelessness. "I lived on the streets once and the most important thing in the world is to make my rent payments on time."

In 1985 he checked into rehab and therapy. He got himself an apartment, worked a string of successive jobs, and fought a long battle to stay clean (often using sports and music as a substitute.)

Last year he rediscovered the cruelties of our system when he applied for welfare, and waited five months before getting a response, let alone an approval. "If there is one thing I want to get across to you it's that you should never let yourself get in a position where you have to depend on the system. Being a veteran has nothing to do with it, anybody should be entitled to assistance without being humiliated."

At the time, I thought "US Veteran serves country and gets denied assistance" would make a good human interest story. I mentioned the idea of speaking to the press and he replied, "I'm beyond talking to any newspaper, I'm spewing my anger to you, but to see it in print would just be an ego thing. I have no faith in this system, democracy, or what it could do for me. I haven't voted in 20 years."

He brought the recent bias-related incidents in our neighborhood up as an example of "the hate and misunderstanding that this society breeds."

I replied the actions of several cruel individuals does not represent the mainstream or even implicit values in our society, and that his perception is clouded by negativity. At first I attributed his refusal to listen to me as a result of my relative inexperience in this world, but it was not that. My neighbor had blocked out all voices but anger, and had not only given up on the world around him, but on himself also.

The human mind has a constant need to judge, but how does one evaluate such a complex story? How could anybody deal with that kind of pain, how does one go to bed at night when they have "war dreams" to look forward to? Certainly there have been many people who have done so with more success than my neighbor. Society dealt my friend a bad hand, but it did not rob him of the opportunity to make some choices. In this world, an individual's perception of reality is as important as the reality itself. If a 46-year-old views himself as dead and hopeless, then that is what they will be.

My friend cannot live because he is constricted by fear. Walking down the street with a grimace toward the world cuts the individual off from the inter-connectedness of that world. If one can develop a friendly wink or a laugh, then no matter the circumstances, one can be exposed to the kindness that exists in the world. Every day is difficult for one who is down and out. Imagine how lucky those are who (based on either their experience or their attitude) can wake up in the morning and say, "Wow! Anything is possible, love is possible."

February offers many new novels

By Ron Berthel
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Primary Colors has been getting the primary share of the books news, but it isn't the only new hardcover February has to offer.

Among others are new fiction by John Updike, Harold Robbins and Ursula K. Le Guin, and nonfiction by Sen. Bill Bradley, attorney Alan M. Dershowitz and historian Stephen E. Ambrose.

Primary Colors (Random House) isn't a whodunit, but it has one of publishing's biggest mysteries of late: Who wrote it? Speculation about the identity of its author — credited only as Anonymous — helped make the novel a best-seller only days after publication.

Primary Colors is the story of Jack Stanton's presidential campaign as narrated by a young, idealistic campaign worker. The stumping Stanton, governor of a small Southern state, deals with questions about his draft dodging and sexual escapades, while he satisfies his appetites for barbecue and lust.

Updike offers his 17th novel, In the Beauty of the Lilies (Knopf). It's the Pulitzer Prize-winner's tale of the Wilmot family and how its members relate to God through four generations, from 1910 to 1990.

Sure to steam up your windshield is Harold Robbins' latest novel of the automobile industry, The Stallion (Simon & Schuster).

This sequel to The Betsy picks up 25 years later and finds Angelo Perino and Loren Hardeman III reunited at Bethlehem Motors and still bitter enemies.

Le Guin, best known for her science fiction, offers a volume of 18 mainstream short stories that appeared in The New Yorker, Harper's and other magazines during the past decade, in Unlocking the Air (HarperCollins).

In Time Present, Time Past (Knopf), Bradley, a three-term senator from New Jersey, Olympic gold medalist, Rhodes scholar and New York Knicks basketball star, offers a volume of memoirs along with his assessment of America today and its future.

Dershowitz, the attorney who would have prepared O.J. Simpson's appeal, uses the murder trial to show how the U.S. legal system operates, while he points out the forces that influence it, in Reasonable Doubts (Simon & Schuster).

A profile of Meriwether Lewis, leader of the expedition that explored the Louisiana Territory, is offered in Ambrose's Undaunted Courage (Simon & Schuster).

Among the aspects Ambrose covers are Lewis' long-unrecognized scientific contributions, his relationships with Thomas Jefferson and with fellow explorer William Clark, and why Lewis returned from the expedition believing he had failed.

Among other new titles of note is Rogue Warrior: Task Force Blue (Pocket) by Richard Marcinko and John Weisman. It's the third novel to feature the heroics of former Navy SEAL Marcinko as he infiltrates a terrorist group backed by a billionaire with presidential aspirations.

Bette Bao Lord begins her novel, The Middle Heart (Knopf) in 1932, when Japan conquered Manchuria. She tells of three young Chinese who form an alliance to forever defend their homeland, and of their personal successes during China's tumultuous recent history.

Alternative-history fiction is offered in Worldwar: Upsetting the Balance (Del Rey), Harry Turtledove's third book in the Worldwar trilogy. World War II is over, but Earthlings are scrambling to develop sophisticated weaponry — an atomic bomb, perhaps — to defend themselves against alien invaders.

American justice comes under scrutiny in Don't Pee on My Leg and Tell Me It's Raining (HarperCollins) by Judy Sheindlin, who chronicles her two decades as New York City family court judge and offers suggestions about the juvenile delinquency problem; and in Guilty: The Collapse of Criminal Justice (Random House) by Harold J. Rothwax, New York State Supreme Court judge, who offers a critical evaluation of America's courts system.

In Brain Fever (Doubleday), Valerie Sayers' novel, Timothy Rooney leaves his South Carolina home — without the medication that keeps him mentally stable, but with $15,000 in his shoes— to find the ex-wife from his six-day marriage.

Mario Vargas Llosa tells the story of two federal officers investigating the disappearance of three men in a remote Peruvian village, where the suspects include a Marxist guerrilla group and a local witch and her cannibalistic husband, in his novel, Death in the Andes (Farrar, Straus, Giroux).

In Love Thy Neighbor (Knopf), Peter Maass, a writer for the Washington Post, relates episodes from the war in Bosnia that involve its soldiers, citizens and leaders; and in Balkan Odyssey (Harcourt Brace), David Owen offers an account of his efforts as co-chairman of an international committee to end the Bosnian War.

Annual awards to be shown on CBS

Grammy nominees include Alanis Morissette, Mariah Carey

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

COURTESY JOAN OSBORNE

Tonight in Los Angeles, the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences will present the 38th annual Grammy awards. The event, to be broadcast on CBS, will be hosted by Ellen DeGeneres of the hit TV show "Ellen."

The highlight for the evening will be live performances by all five nominees for the highly coveted Record Of the Year. In the running are Mariah Carey & Boyz II Men — "One Sweet Day," Coolio — "Gangsta's Paradise," Joan Osbourne — "One of Us," Seal — "Kiss From A Rose" and TLC — "Waterfalls." Who will win? Probably "One Sweet Day" or "One of Us." Who should win? "Gangsta's Paradise" or "Waterfalls" but the Academy is far too conservative to recognize these gems.

Alanis Morissette will certainly shake up some controversy amongst the Christian Right if her song "You Oughta Know" wins Song Of the Year. It would be first Song of the Year winner ever to include the word "fuck" in the lyrics. For that reason alone, the angry Canadian has little chance to take home the prize, but she will be performing live.

Morissette's competition is steep for Song of the Year — All-4-One — "I Can Love You Like That," Joan Osbourne — "One of Us," Seal — "Kiss From A Rose" and Michael Jackson — "You Are Not Alone." Sorry Michael you have no chance and, yes, you are alone.

Grunge rockers Pearl Jam are the surprise nominee for album of the year with their third effort Vitalogy which is viewed by many as their weakest release yet. Somehow Michael Jackson received a nomination for HIStory. The real race for album of the year will be between the Big Three Female artists of 1995, Mariah Carey, Alanis Morissette and Joan Osbourne who are respectively nominated for Daydream, Jagged Little Pill and Relish.

Controversy arose over the nomination for best new artist as nominees Joan Osbourne, Hootie & the Blowfish and Alanis Morissette all had released albums prior to their commercial breakthroughs. Morissette, for example, has three albums under her belt and was already a well established star in Canada. Thank the Academy for their novel definition of "new."

One category that must make the elder members of the Academy shiver with fear is Best Rap Album. Just imagine an 80-year-old classically trained musician listening to 2Pac's Dear Mama or Dr. Dre's Keep Their Heads Ringin'. Scary, huh? Other nominees include Coolio's Gangsta's Paradise, The Notorious B.I.G's Big Poppa and Skee Lo's I Wish. Coolio should win pretty easily, but 2Pac may cause a heart attack or two.

As usual the Academy has continued to reward aging rock stars for their past success and not their recent musical efforts. The Eagles, who won the 1977 Record of the Year Grammy for "Hotel California" have a chance to win Best Rock Performance by a Duo Or Group With Vocal for a new rendition of the same song that appears on their critically trashed, Hell Freezes Over.

Other '70s legends Robert Plant and Jimmy Page, may finally win themselves a Grammy, something they never did with Led Zeppelin. The two elder statesmen of hard rock are nominated for Best Rock Performance by a Duo Or Group With Vocal for their new version of the Led Zep classic, "Kashmir."

Once again the National Academy of Recording Arts & Science will be criticized severely for their voting and nonince policy. And why not? They are same voters to choose Milli Vanilli as Best New Artist several years ago. Scary thing. Milli Vanilli may not have sung a single note but "Blame It On the Rain" is a helluva lot better than anything Hootie & The Blowfish have ever sung. For all you Hootie fans, get ready, those lovable jocks from South Carolina will certainly rock up your world as they appear live at tonight's Grammy's.

Joan Osborne's album, Relish has been nominated for "Record of the Year."

Chan brings fresh twist to new movie

By Justin Daniel Smith
Collegian Staff

RUMBLE IN THE BRONX
Directed by Stanley Tong with Jackie Chan, Anita Mui
Playing at Hampshire Six

Hong Kong has become the new hotbed in Hollywood cinema — and rightly so.

Americans are fed up with big budget, go-nowhere fiascos that keep rehashing the same ideas. What is needed is fast, relentless action to satiate the short attention span of audiences. John Woo is making a bang with Broken Arrow and now Hong Kong's other godfather of velocity, Jackie Chan, has come to bombard audiences with his offbeat heroics.

Rumble in the Bronx is a typical Jackie Chan film with eye-catching whirlwind antics that, however mindless, still become extremely entertaining. Chan plays Keung, a Hong Kong supercop that visits New York for his uncle's wedding. His uncle has a gang-infested market in a tough neighborhood in the Bronx. He skips town for his honeymoon, selling the market to a young business women that hires Keung to stick around and help.

Keung quickly becomes the target of the gangbangers' illicit violence. His neighbor is a poor little boy in a wheelchair whose older sister is part of the local gang. But wouldn't you know it, she means well and Keung brings it out of her.

Angelo, one the small time gang thugs, happens upon a big time diamond deal for a crimelord, known only as the White Tiger. Angelo makes off with the diamonds and stashes them in the wheelchair cushion of the unfortunate child. Keung is forced to fend off the bad guys with his roundhouse kicks and fists of fury.

After Keung battles his way through a warehouse of gang membersthey are quick to find that the only way they can survive the war waged on them by the evil White Tiger is with the help of Keung.

Chan, who choreographs and does all of his own stunts, creates a ballet of comedic destruction. Not since the days of Buster Keaton has one person had so much poise in physical comedy. Chan's agile body performs death-defying stunts, in one of which he actually broke his ankle.

For American audiences, this will be a great introduction to Chan's work, but those already familiar with this genius will find that it plays as a standard Chan film. As with all of Chan's movies, the ending credits roll over actual stunt bloopers that occurred in the shooting. Drunken Master II and Police Story III – Super Cop, two recent Chan vehicles, are definite superiors.

But Rumble, the highest grossing Hong Kong film of all– time, is no less spectacular with its visual mayhem than his previous outings. Stanley Tong, who also directed Super Cop III, realizes that a thin storyline can be put in the background as long as the fighting dynamics of Chan remains the prominent force.

Some problems arise in the translation. Apparently much of the Cantonese version had humor based in the language barrier between Chan and the Americans. Translated and poorly dubbed, the film's large budget is disguised and come off as flaws to Hollywood audiences.

As a foreign film that is being passed off as a Hollywood feature, people will undoubtedly have trouble with the mis– portrayal of Americans. Gangs travel by neon motorcycles and wear bright jackets a la 1986. Settings appear particularly un–New York–like (the film was actually shot in Canada and Seattle).

All of that aside, it is clear that Chan will be welcomed with open arms in the States. As Hong Kong and Hollywood move closer together, films like Rumble in the Bronx will be an inviting, fresh twist to the action genre. B+

Acting ok, but movie is forgettable

By Jennifer Howell
Collegian Correspondent

UNFORGETTABLE
Directed by John Dahl with Ray Liotta, Linda Fiorentino
Playing at Mt. Farms Four

Unforgettable, a film which belies its title, takes a promising premise and creates an easily forgettable movie, which blends in with other dark thrillers of its type, and leaves no distinctive mark.

The premise in Unforgettable is something like a cross between The Fugitive and Strange Days. Doctor David Krane (Ray Liotta) is a lonely medical examiner deprived of the only remaining joy in his life, his children, after the charge against him of killing his wife is dropped on a technicality.

An obsession with finding his wife's murderer is reawakened when he finds a strangely folded matchbook on a crime scene, identical to one found in his wife's office. His obsession is given direction when he learns about a technology Dr. Martha Briggs (Linda Fiorentino) has been trying on rats, which allows the rats to experience each other's memories through the injection of cerebral spinal fluid.

Krane hijacks the technology and makes himself a human guinea pig, experiencing traumatic memories in hopes of solving his wife's murder. In doing so, he also experiences the debilitating dangers to his heart and mental state that come with the memories. Briggs, worried that Krane might kill himself with her discovery, tags along with Krane in a quest that becomes more dangerous the closer they get to the real murderer.

Unforgettable is by no means a bad movie, but it is not particularly entertaining. The acting on the part of Liotta, Fiorentino and the rest of the cast was faultless, but none of the characters were really that interesting. Though the plot twisted several times, it was always possible to guess what would happen in a few minutes, and the revelation was never particularly exciting.

Vivid and dramatic memories experienced by Krane provided for moments of interest in the movie. However, the film is too cluttered, with numerous scenes of Krane breaking into his lab and other places to steal various people's cerebral spinal fluid. For a movie intended to be a dark film noir thriller, the action is slow, and this lag is not compensated for with witty dialogue or a truly compelling murder mystery.

Unforgettable might be quite enjoyable for some audiences. True film noir devotees or anyone intrigued by the film's premise of experiencing others' memories might find much to enjoy in this film. But for a general audience, Unforgettable offers little but a two hours' diversion, lost when the lights go up in the theater. B–

Six stars to arrive at Bacon

By Christopher McDougall
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA— Forget all that art-school drool you hear about Stanislavsky and Orson Welles. The stars in the movie universe revolve around Kevin Bacon, and there are plenty of bar jocks eager to prove it.

Name any actor, they say, and a chain of co-stars will lead you right back to the guy who made his world debut getting his butt whacked in Animal House.

The bar stool version of the challenge goes by "Six Degrees to Kevin Bacon," while on the Internet, it's "The Kevin Bacon Game."

Either way, the rules are the same— start with an actor, then hopscotch from connection to connection until you hit Bacon.

Take the great Marlon Brando. Brando starred in A Dry White Season with Donald Sutherland. Translated and poorly dubbed, the film's large budget is disguised and come off as flaws to Hollywood audiences.

Sutherland was the pot-smoking professor in Animal House, in which Bacon debuted as a walk-on frat boy.

Jimmy Cagney?

Cagney faced Humphrey Bogart in The Roaring Twenties. Bogart to Katharine Hepburn (The African Queen); Hepburn to Jane Fonda (On Golden Pond); Fonda to Robert Redford (Barefoot in the Park); Redford to Meryl Streep (Out of Africa); Streep to Bacon in The River Wild.

All within the requisite six moves.

This Buddhist notion of the interrelatedness of all film is a goofy twist on a theory popularized by John Guare in his 1990 play Six Degrees of Separation— that you and King Zwelithini of the Zulu Nation are just a half dozen handshakes apart.

So why Bacon? His father was wondering the same thing.

"I'd be greatly interested to know how he became the focus of all this," said noted Philadelphia city planner Edmond Bacon, who hasn't yet taken a crack at the game.

"I asked Kevin, but he didn't know," the elder Bacon said. "Call me back if you find out."

Bacon, meanwhile, was in Utah making his directorial debut at the Sundance Film Festival with Losing Chase, and was unavailable for either a comment or a quick one-on-one.

His press agent, Allan Eichorn, said the notably wry actor found the game "amusing and flattering." But beyond hearing that some college students with too few credits on their minds had dreamed it up, Eichorn said Bacon had no idea how he'd won the title.

Chalk it up to luck— his rhymes with "separation"— and looks— that Wheaties-box mug that made him the perfect college kid in Animal House, everybody's buddy in Diner and an All-American hero in Apollo 13.

His life is even middle-of-the-road, as actors' lives go. Raised in Philadelphia, Bacon moved to New York as a 17-year-old to join the ranks of table-waiting drama students. He was still slinging hash when Animal House was released in 1976, but not for long.

The alcoholic wisecare he played in Diner made Bacon a name, and he hasn't looked back.

He may have done his share of fluffy numbers such as Footloose and Quicksilver, and campy thrillers such as Tremors, but now Bacon has moved on to hard-edged dramas like A Few Good Men, The River Wild and Murder in the First.

All of this makes him an excellent candidate for movie trivia, film buff Mason Levinson says.

"You play once or twice, and suddenly you're Bacon-obsessed. You're constantly scanning for more and more bizarre combinations," said Levinson, who learned the game on a flight to Paris and spent the entire week shooting and fielding challenges with his tour guide.

Internet whiz Matthew Bennet will crack his knuckles and take on any challenge. He boasts of making Bacon chains to Elvis, Vanilla Ice, The Wicked Witch of the West and the entire cast of Gilligan's Island.

Remember Alan Hale Jr.?

The Skipper was in Back to the Beach with Pee-wee Herman, whose fizzled film career perked up with a cameo in Batman Returns. Batman star Michael Keaton appeared with Bacon in She's Having a Baby.

Since October, more than 6,478 surfers have logged in to Bennet's Makin' Bacon page (http://www.mindspring.com/mab/kevin.html) with curveball queries.

The trickiest challenges, according to Levinson, are the one or two timers.

He cleaned up on beers one night when a bartender stumped every stool in the place with that short-lived James Bond, Timothy Dalton.

Dalton made one of his two James Bond appearances in The Living Daylights. Jeroen Krabbe was also in the film, giving Levinson a link to The Fugitive (Krabbe was the evil Dr. Charles Nichols). From Krabbe, it's a quick stroll to Fugitive co-star Tommy Lee Jones, and from Jones to Bacon in JFK.

"You can say it's only a game, but is some ways it's quite theological," said Bacon adept Andrea Burns. "Very Zen."

year that I've been [at UMass], the same thing has happened. You get caught up in [the success]. The little things in a game that you let slip, come back to haunt you. For us, [the loss] comes at a good time.

"The pressure for us right now is to prepare, to get better. It's time to look in mirror. We all agree what the solutions are. Wake Forest got beat by 20, UConn goes down to Georgetown and gets blown away — those things happen. What you have to do is learn from them and try to figure out why it happened."

Calipari calls Bright the "best finisher in the country" but the Baltimore native is coming off one of the worst games of his career against GW, in which he missed three dunks and a layup. Cambs has been struggling of late also. Against GW, the 6-foot-11-inch junior shot just 8-for-21 from the field.

"[The team] accepts that we have to do some things now," Calipari said. "We have to step it up. We needed that [loss]. We have kids in a great frame of mind. We have no distractions within our team — none. As long as that's the case we're going to be okay."

"UMass is coming off a loss, that should be fun," Martelli said. "[This game] will get the juices flowing again [for us] real quick this week."

As is the tradition on Senior night, all of the UMass seniors will start. Here's a quick look at each of the seniors:

Dingle has been the top defender for UMass all season and is usually the guy to get the assignment of guarding the opposing team's top player. He did this against Virginia Tech's leading scorer Ace Custis and held him to seven points.

Bright, after playing inconsistent ball for his first two seasons, has finally lived up the lofty expectations put upon him when he entered UMass four years ago. He's been the Minutemen's second leading scorer all year with top performances against Wake Forest (22 points), Boston College (24 points), Rhode Island (32 points, nine boards), Pittsburgh (26 points), Xavier (21 points, seven boards) and Virginia Tech (19 points, six boards).

Nunez, a walk-on, has been a spark-plug off the bench, and his enthusiastic and aggressive play made him a fan favorite. Often one of the first players off the bench for UMass, Nunez' inspired play earned him scholarship.

In his four years at UMass, Cottrell has produced solid minutes off the bench, especially this season. Against Fordham, the Annapolis, Md. native saw his most action of the season and responded with six points and three boards in 10 minutes.

Giddel Padilla, the older brother of Edgar, originally walked-on at UMass during the 1992-93 season but left the team during the 1993-94 season Padilla's best performances this season have come against Fordham (Jan. 30) when he totaled four points and three rebounds.

"We all just tried to focus, because it was a big game," Gurile said. "It was hard coming into this game knowing that this would be our last game together. We just tried to focus on the game at hand, on what we had to do."

URI's Smith acknowledged the emotion from Senior Night.

"Your last game at home, you want to go out with a bang," Smith said. "They really wanted this game, you could tell."

With the victory the Minutewomen completed an undefeated season at home, going 12-0 in the Mullins Center. As the No. 2 East seed in the A-10 Tournament, the Minutewomen will play the winner of the Virginia Tech/Fordham game on Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Before the game the Massachusetts team honored its seniors: Gurile, Thomas, Hopson and Nicole Carter.

boards against Temple on Feb. 8 with 851 boards. Thumas is tied with Gurile for best free throw performance of the season with a 10-for-10 night against LaSalle, an NCAA best. She is ranked fifth in the conference in scoring with 17.2 ppg and third in field goal percentage with 55.3 percent.

Hopson's prowess at the point spot has been consistent in her four years as a Minutewomen. With 37 career starts, Hopson averaged 2.5 assists per game. Carter has tallied 23 career starts and earned her career bests this season in points (nine) and steals (three).

UMass and its senior crew now head to Blacksburg, Va. for the A-10 Tournament. Their first match will be Saturday night against the winner of the Virginia Tech/Fordham game.

Men's gym falls to 'Cuse; New Englands up next

By Jason Rubin
Collegian Staff

Winning isn't everything.

That was the case this weekend, as the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team fell to the Orangemen of Syracuse University. In a closely contested battle, SU edged UMass by the score of 225.6 to 224.5.

Despite the defeat, the team is upbeat and confident.

"The Syracuse meet was a great one for us," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "We showed that we are capable of recording a score that would place us at the NCAA's."

The score of 224.3 was not only a season high, but also qualified the team for the NCAA championships. A goal that at the beginning of the year, appeared improbable.

The Minutemen seem to have pulled themselves out of the mini mid-season funk that they were stuck in. After dropping two of their last meets, the team has rebounded strong.

The Syracuse meet was enjoyable for the whole team. "Syracuse was fun. It's great when you have a close meet. Obviously it's nice to get the win. But with a meet like this, against such a good team, it is still very rewarding," sophomore Dan Young said.

Numerous gymnasts made key contributions. Junior Ruslan Shupak took first place in the still rings with a score of 9.750 and tied for first on the floor exercises with another score of 9.750.

Freshman Brad LeClair placed first on the pommel horse with a season-high of 9.600.

Junior Gabe Columbus won the high bar with a score of 9.65. Columbus was also the team's top all-around performer, scoring a career-high 56.1 to place second at the meet.

"This week we saw what we are capable of. We had a few bad meets, but it's time to pick it up, and I think we have," he said.

The next test for the Minutemen comes on March 2, when they host the 1996 New England championships. Traditionally, this has been a meet where UMass has had some success.

"The New Englands are more of a relaxing thing. There is not a lot of pressure. We need to do the best we can, and a win is well within our reach," Young said.

The New England championships is an opportunity for UMass to refine those routines that have been giving the team trouble. It is the final meet prior to any post-season matches that the team will be competing in.

"The New Englands should be a good meet for us. It gives us a chance to practice for our ultimate goal, which is the EIGL championships," senior Andy Fulmer said.

Post-season hopes are high for the Minutemen. They find themselves ranked fifth in the nation, and are coming off their best performance of the season.

If the team can maintain a team score around the 224 mark that they scored this week, then they are in great shape to qualify for the NCAA championships, which would give UMass the opportunity to show where it stands against the nation's top teams.

Canseco to miss more workouts

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Another day, another missed workout for Jose Canseco.

Boston Red Sox manager Kevin Kennedy went to great lengths Tuesday to explain that Canseco had to testify in a lawsuit in Miami and would miss practices today and possibly yesterday. Canseco already had missed two workouts in the first eight days of training camp.

"I would have liked to have taken care of the situation earlier," said Canseco, who denied it was related to his divorce. "I've never lost in court, so I have no intention of losing."

Kennedy, a close friend of Canseco's, defended his decision to excuse Canseco from practice.

"If that's preferential treatment, then so be it," he said, adding that he would excuse any player in that situation. "I think a better word for what we're doing is being smart for the good of the Red Sox and for the good of Jose Canseco."

A resolution now would keep Canseco from missing time during the regular season. Canseco reported to camp the afternoon of Feb. 20 and missed that morning's first full-squad workout after playing in a charity golf tournament the previous day. He also missed Sunday's workout when he returned to Miami, thinking an out-of-court settlement could be reached, Kennedy said. That effort failed, and Kennedy said Canseco will be gone one or two days this time and should return for Friday night's exhibition game against Boston College.

Kennedy said the case has been continued six times during the past five years but wouldn't reveal details. Canseco said well-known, wealthy players like himself are targets for lawsuits.

"I've had a lot of frivolous lawsuits instituted against me," he said. "There's always going to be someone trying something else."

Asked about a possible public perception that Kennedy's treatment of Canseco might upset other Boston players, Canseco said, "The public perception doesn't interest me one bit. Internally, everything is perfect."

After Canseco missed the opening workout, Mo Vaughn and Roger Clemens said they weren't concerned. Since camp opened, pitcher Stan Belinda was given a day off after his grandfather died, and coach Johnny Pesky was excused to attend a function yesterday.

Wakefield wants more than contract renewal

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — Tim Wakefield renewed his career last season with the Boston Red Sox and wants a better deal than a contract renewal this season.

The knuckleballer rebounded from a 5-15 minor-league record in 1994 to go 14-1 in his first 17 starts with Boston in 1995. But he has little leverage since he doesn't have enough big-league experience to be eligible for arbitration or free agency. General manager Dan Duquette says talks are continuing toward an agreement but Wakefield and the other 10 players whose deals can be renewed will have contracts one way or another by Saturday. If the Red Sox renew Wakefield's contract, worth $175,000 last year, they can cut its value by 20 percent, although that's extremely unlikely. Wakefield wants a multi-year deal.

"If they do renew me, I think I'll be very disappointed," he said. "I felt committed to the ballclub and, if (Duquette)" renews me, I really won't feel very committed. You do what I did last year, you have a tendency to want to feel wanted."

He sees a renewal as a slap at his attitude and accomplishments that made him the Red Sox winningest pitcher last year at 16-8 and helped them win the AL East title.

"The team has a lot of confidence in Tim Wakefield, and we're prepared to make him a good offer," Duquette said. "Renewals happen every year. Pedro Martinez has been renewed two years in a row and he's been one of the top pitchers in the National League."

Wakefield, whose knuckler already is dancing in the second week of spring training, also is annoyed with talk of his decline in the last six weeks of last season when he was 2-7 with a 5.57 ERA.

"Was the second half really that bad?" he asks. "It upsets me every time somebody brings it up. I feel I pitched well enough to win in the second half, and the numbers weren't there."

His career had nosedived since his rookie season with Pittsburgh in 1992 when he was 8-1 and went 2-0 in the NL playoffs. But he was 6-11 with the Pirates the next year.

Wakefield never made it to the majors in 1994 when he led the American Association with 15 losses. Duquette took a chance after Pittsburgh released him last spring and it paid off. In his first start May 27, he pitched seven innings in a 12-1 win over California. After just two days rest, he beat Oakland 1-0 when he allowed two hits in 7 1-3 innings.

He won a 10-inning complete game in his third start, then took a no-hitter into the eighth inning of his fourth start. From July 4 through Sept. 3, he led the American League in ERA.

But what about that late-season slide when batters started pounding his knuckler?

Minutewomen win three over weekend

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

Add three more wins to the list for the Massachusetts women's tennis team as this past weekend they defeated Vermont, Bucknell and Colgate in Hamilton, N.Y. to start off the spring season undefeated.

This will now up their overall record to 12-1, 9-1 from the fall season.

"We came out really ready to play," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "They were very focused. It wasn't sloppy and everybody was much on target."

The Minutewomen started off in their first match of the weekend against Vermont. The doubles matches were first as all three teams for UMass defeated the competition very handily.

It was the No. 1 doubles duo of Liesl Sitton and Caroline Steele who got things rolling as they pummeled the team of Abbey Woolridge and Ann Dandrian for Vermont, 8-0.

Marie-Christine Caron and Jackie Braunstein took care of Becky Sohn and Courtney Bealko 8-2, and Caron and Lana Goredetskaya defeated the team of Rubel and Bealko 8-4.

In all three matches this weekend UMass did not have to go the distance in playing all nine contests — three doubles and six singles — because the Minutewomen had captured five points early on, and the match gets called as the opposition is eliminated.

UMass only needed three more points but needed to play four games as Sitton defeated Woolridge 6-4, 6-1 in the first singles contest. Dandrian defeated UMass' Braunstein, who is still recovering from an injury, 6-2, 6-4, for the only point Vermont was able to scrap up.

Caron took care of Sohn (6-3, 6-0) and Elizabeth Durant beat Bealko (6-2, 6-3) as the Minutewomen captured the victory, 5-1.

Bucknell was the second contest of the weekend for UMass, replacing Duquesne who did not make the trip. However, Bucknell did not fair too well, arriving 25 minutes late for the match and not having its No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 players with them.

The Minutewomen took all three doubles contests and four singles contests, even though they only needed two for the win, en route to a 5-0 flawless victory.

Sitton and Steele were once again victorious in doubles as well as Durant and Noelle Orsini, along with Caron and Goredetskaya, who all won handily, 8-2, 8-0 and 8-0 respectively.

"It was a less strong team," Dixon said. "However, our focus was there and we were ready."

Orsini, Caron, Durant and Goredetskaya were all winners in the singles matches, with no Bucknell player winning more than three points. Goredetskaya played phenomenal recording a shutout over Bucknell's Jessica Romm, 6-0, 6-0.

The final match of the weekend was a very anticipated one for UMass as it got set to take on Colgate.

UMass started off on a roll as all three doubles matches were won by the Minutewomen. Then Sitton kept things going as she recorded a victory in the first singles match over Samantha Kohn.

Only needing to win one more game, the Minutewomen looked set. However, they got a little bit of a scare as the next two players, Steele and Caron, were downed 6-0, 6-4 and 6-3, 6-2 to Leslie Frank and Alex Alton, respectively.

However, Braunstein took her first game with Jamie Kohn down to the wire but got the victory (7-5) and rallied up the next one 6-4. The Minutewomen were winners 5-2.

"This year we've taken two big steps in beating Providence and Colgate," Dixon said. "It's pushed us up to the next level. We're knocking on the door now of the nationally ranked teams."

The Minutewomen will now have close to a month off to prepare for their next match against Connecticut on March 27, a team who they beat in the fall.

During that span of time they will head down to Florida to train at a tennis camp in which they will be practicing 5-6 hours a day.

"We do a lot of practicing down there," Dixon said. "We always come back a much improved team."

Gretzky finally traded to St. Louis Blues

By R.B. Fallstrom
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Wayne Gretzky, the hockey great who failed to win a Stanley Cup in Los Angeles, was traded to the St. Louis Blues yesterday night, ending weeks of rumor and speculation about his future.

"I do know Wayne Gretzky is a member of the St. Louis Blues," said Al Kerth, spokesman for the Kiel Center Partners, the owners of the Blues.

Kerth gave no other details on the deal involving the most prolific scorer in NHL history. However, the Blues were expected to hold a news conference later in the evening.

"I'd be ready to hold a party," Kerth said.

The Kings would not confirm the trade had been completed. Word of the trade from St. Louis came while Kings governor Bob Sanderman and Kings general manager Sam McMaster were meeting into the evening at the Forum in Inglewood, Calif.

Earlier in the day, Sanderman announced there was "no conclusion" to the negotiations with Gretzky and his agent, but the talks were to resume.

"We want to do what's right for Wayne," Sanderman said at the time. "At the same time, we owe it to our fans to do what's right for the Los Angeles Kings.

"What we're wrestling with is can we do what's right for everybody and have him remain with the Kings. That's our hope and desire."

However, the 35-year-old superstar has played his last game for the Kings and might now be in the lineup for the Blues tomorrow night in Vancouver.

Neither Gretzky nor his agent, Mike Barnett, attended the briefing at the Forum.

That initial announcement dampened anticipation in St. Louis, where the news conference was watched by reporters on a monitor and the team had a podium ready for a satellite news conference of its own.

Sanderman described the 1 1/2-hour meeting as cordial, and said he was optimistic about reaching a conclusion concerning Gretzky this week. The resolution came much sooner.

Gretzky was in the meeting while the Kings practiced for tonight's game. He and Barnett left the building before the news conference began.

Gretzky can become a free agent after this season, and the Kings risked losing him without compensation if they don't sign him. To get Gretzky, the Blues at one time were supposedly poised to give the Kings rookies Craig Johnson and Patrice Tardif, 19-year-old prospect Roman Vopat and their No. 1 pick in the 1997 draft.

The Gretzky trade watch, which has involved a number of teams, had been a strain for all parties involved, and Gretzky said he expected a deal before the March 20 trade deadline.

"It's been going on for 2 1/2 months," Kings coach Larry Robinson said. "Something has to be resolved. It's not good for the team. It's not fair to Wayne either."

Marty McSorley, who was part of the blockbuster trade that sent Gretzky from Edmonton to Los Angeles in 1988, was one of several players who expressed support for Gretzky, the team captain.

"Wayne is our leader," he said at practice. "If Wayne had been moved, it would have been a sure sign of where the team was headed. He's pretty sensitive and he cares about the team. This has been hard on him."

Gretzky played on Monday night in Winnipeg, where he assisted on one goal in a 4-3 loss to the Jets. Afterward, he said he planned to meet with the Kings' owners yesterday, and there would be no trade until that meeting was finished.

Gretzky is making $6.5 million this season, and he earlier scoffed at suggestions he's seeking a new contract that would pay him $21 million for the next three seasons.

A nine-time MVP, Gretzky won four Stanley Cups with Edmonton before coming to the Kings. He sparked hockey interest in Southern California but failed to win an NHL title for the Kings, getting his new team as far as the finals in 1993.

With the prospect of Gretzky coming to St. Louis, the Blues had sold an additional 2,200 tickets in the last two days.

Gretzky, whose wife is from St. Louis, has said he wouldn't have a problem playing for the Blues (27-24-11).

"I'm just one player — it takes 20 guys to win," said Gretzky, who has 15 goals and 65 assists this season. "But Mike Keenan wants to win. That's always nice when you're playing in this league, to play for a guy that always wants to win."

about making a total effort, and that effort made him a three-time 50-goal scorer, a punishing forechecker, and an all-time Bruins great whose career has been as badly marred by injuries as Bobby Orr's. Neely's no Orr, but I think he should be similarly evaluated: Instead of dreaming about what he might have been, admire him for who he was.

• The year 1993-94 was the Year of the Goalie, and in Chinese mythology 1996 is the Year of the Rat (which sounds like good news for the Panthers and Scott Mellanby), but 1995-96 is the Year of the Scorer. Lemieux and Jarmoir Jagr have already reached the century mark in points, and 10 other players are projected to do the same.

• Don't give up, Bob Dole, because the Calgary Flames, left for dead at the quarter-turn, just might be nominated for a Western Conference playoff spot. If you're searching for reasons why, look no further than Roberts, whose 13 goals and 12 assists in 20 games, all earned through his full- throttle style, have ignited his team like nothing else could. If Neely has to go, at least Roberts is left to carry the torch for players hampered by prolonged injury.

• Understand that of the three players who will allegedly be dealt from St. Louis to Los Angeles for Wayne Gretzky, only Craig Johnson is presently with the big club. Now, I understand that certain franchises are cash strapped and are seeking to be competitive with young, affordable players like Johnson, Roman Vopat and Patriee Tardif (who I like— he got props in this space last season), but the Kings? I mean, isn't LA one of the world's few places where an outward expression of wealth is the norm? I said last week that Gretzky won't help the Kings much, but he's still worth more than this. I don't know what LA is thinking.

• Hey, didn't you used to be Stephane Richer?

• One poke I forgot to make at Hockey Stars #46 last time was meant for the thumbs up given to "beautiful women." Hey, not that the thumbs should go the other way, but the writers at HS should be writing about the game, not the babes in the stands. And what about the female readers? I'm sure plenty of them don't get as excited when Carol Alt shows up at Madison Square Garden.

One woman who wouldn't stand for this crap for a moment is Sherry Ross, radio color analyst for the New Jersey Devils and author of the annual Hockey Scouting Report. I defy anyone to name another with more knowledge of every NHL player (except Valeri Kamensky, whose absence I cannot explain). Obviously Ross' job enables her to see all the teams, but I understand she does her job very well, which can't leave much time for her to take the detailed notes that must lead to the wonderful descriptions contained in the book. I don't know how she does it.

Among my favorites:

• Vladimir Malakhov developed his huge skating strides playing bandy, a Russian game similar to hockey, but played on ice the size of a soccer field.

• Zarley Zalapski may have unparalleled skills, but all his shots are full blast, making none of them tippable. "He does not keep anyone guessing," Ross writes.

• Adam Oates will play a dump-and-chase game (which the Bruins currently favor) "if he is being shadowed closely, throwing the puck smartly into the opposite corner and with just the right velocity to allow his wingers to get in on top of the defense." Right on Ross, you do your name (Art Ross) proud.

Frosh Toye breaks record to lead UMass at NEs

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

Tom Toye broke his own Massachusetts indoor record in the 200-meter sprint at the New England Championships this weekend pacing a strong overall performance by the Minutemen.

Toye, a freshman from Scarborough, Maine, originally set the mark of 22.12 seconds on Feb. 10 at the Valentine Invitational in Boston, breaking the previous record set by Kevin Walters in 1992. He shaved nearly one tenth of a second off his record time in finishing third overall with a time of 22.03.

"I was happy with my performance," said Toye, of his record run. "I just want to do the best I can."

Toye continues to be the team leader in both the 200 and 400-meter races, and will compete in the 400 at the IC4A Championships. Toye said he doesn't hold too much stock in being the team leader, though.

"As a team, we kind of share the leadership role," he said. "I don't necessarily think of myself as a leader. We all pull together."

Three other Minutemen pushed their names into the Massachusetts record books with top five all-time performances.

Junior Paul Blodorn qualified for IC4As with a time of 1:52.71 in the 800, placing him second on the all-time indoor list sandwiched between two Class of '88 alums. Blodorn is a scant .13 seconds behind Bill Stewart and an even more minute .03 seconds ahead of Steve Tolley.

David Cahill, a native of Newton, clocked a season-best performance (1:06.10) in the 500 placing himself fifth in UMass history, knocking Mickey Baugh's name out of the media guide.

Senior captain Mark LeFebvre placed seventh at New Englands with a throw of 50-feet-10.25 inches in the shot put carving his name in the fifth spot on the all-time list just an inch-and-a-quarter behind his own career-best chuck.

In a meet where the Minutemen didn't score many team points, the performance of the 4x800-meter relay was a pleasant surprise. Coach Ken O'Brien's newest foursome recorded a season-best time (7:46.27) while posting a fifth place finish

Massachusetts had a little trouble in the 4x400 relay, as Neil Concepcion cut off another runner causing the Minutemen to be disqualified.

Toye, Blodorn and LeFebvre will be leading a small crew of O'Brien's elite athletes as they head to Boston this weekend to compete in IC4As, the final championship event of the season.

February, that coming before 10,087 at Joe Louis Arena against Michigan State, the only team ahead of LSSU in the standings.

With a well-balanced team with excellent depth at forward, solid defense and one of the nation's best netminders in John Grahme the Lakers have the proto- typical play-off chemistry and are serious contenders.

As usual Lake Superior is a team that no one wants to see in the post-season and avoid at all costs. Jackson primes his team for the playoffs, and after winning national championships in 1992 and 1994, Lake State is due for another in 1996.

• Legendary Michigan coach Red Berenson was so irked by his team's performance against the Lakers this weekend that he cancelled the team's breakfast Sunday morning and made them board the bus back to Ann Arbor at 6 a.m.

Not every visitor to the Soo came away disappointed this weekend. Jon Barkan of USA Today was the winner of $931 in the Lakers' 50/50 raffle on Friday and was just two digits off from winning over $1,300 the following night.

• Boston College's Marty Reasoner has solidified his position as the top freshman in Hockey East, helping carry the Eagles into fifth place after being placed on a line with Don Chase and David Hymovitz in January.

Reasoner has gone on a scoring spree and has won the conference's Rookie of the Week award a record eight times. Even in his 1993 Hobey Baker winning freshman season, Maine's Paul Kariya only won it five times.

The Deerfield Academy product built off of a stellar showing on the US Junior National team, and has shown a complete game since. Reasuner is a great playmaker in addition to being a solid finisher, and will certainly go highly in this summer's NHL draft, where he is projected as a possible first-round pick.

Reasoner baffled Junior National teammate Jeremiah McCarthy in the Beanpot consolation game with some creative dangles.

"Reasoner is a terrific player," Harvard coach Ronn Tomassoni said afterwards. "He makes an awful lot of things happen out there. Just when you think you have him contained, he's slippery and escapes."

There appears to be a stockpile of solid freshman forwards at the Heights as in addition to Reasoner, freshman Frin Magee has set the women's hockey world ablaze, winning the ECAC's Rookie of the Week award five times. Magee set single-season school records in goals and points, placing third in the league in each.

Magee is the likely winner of the ECAC Rookie of the Year award, won last year by Yale goalie Lauric Bellveau. Both attended St. Mark's School in Southboro, which also claims presidential hopeful Steve Forbes amongst its alumni.

It's good to see that at least two of the school's alumni have had incredible success during their first year in a new environment.

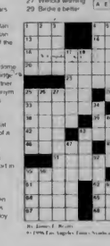
ANSWER TO PREVIOUS PUZZLE:



YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

ARIES (March 21 – April 19) — Vocational developments of a positive nature are in the spotlight. Accept a heavier workload with good grace; it could mean a salary increase. Your rapport with an attractive member of the opposite sex increases.

TAURUS (April 20 – May 20) — Your hunches are accurate. Use your bargaining chips wisely and you will land a new contract or assignment. Diplomacy helps you handle sensitive matters.

GEMINI (May 21 – June 20) — Unexpected developments at work could put you on edge. Focus on what must be done. Once you get results, you can turn your attention to friends and fun!

CANCER (June 21 – July 22) — A declaration of love rekindles a romantic flame. Act swiftly in a financial matter. Take a chance on information that will put you at the controls.

LEO (July 23 – Aug. 22) — Defer judgment until all the facts and figures are in. Give your mate or your partner the benefit of the doubt. Getting caught up in a whirlwind of financial activity will be good for you!

VIRGO (Aug. 23 – Sept. 22) — Group interaction will lead to new goals and friendships. You instinctively know how to make allies out of your co-workers. Progress onward. Leap over hurdles to finish an important race.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 – Oct. 22) — Group support makes a long day easier. Let your imagination roam during periods of reflection. Family members will respond favorably if you are affectionate. Emphasize both consideration and romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 – Nov. 21) — Stormy news could rock your boat. Send out a distress signal to someone in a position to help you. Things work out fine! You need to be cautious in financial matters. Rethink your priorities.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 – Dec. 21) — You have a strong desire to make things happen at work. Jump in the driver's seat and take the express alone to success! Bold ideas galvanize an appreciative audience. They beg you for more.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 – Jan. 19) — Haste could make waste now. Slow down. Taking an interest in a special project will help you establish a bond with a fascinating newcomer. Offer practical assistance, not vague promises.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 – Feb. 18) — Transportation delays are possible today. Allow extra time to get to appointments. Planning ahead will work wonders at work. Let higher-ups see how you have taken every contingency into account.

PISCES (Feb. 19 – March 20) — You and a business associate are in complete agreement on a financial issue. Try to consolidate your debts. Work out a plan to pay off a loan in stages.

50,000 eyes will look at your ad if placed in the COLLEGIAN CLASSIFIEDS. Now for your convenience at the Campus Center Concourse on Thursdays. Ask for our specials.

Massachusetts downs Lady Rams on Senior Night

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Senior Night, at any arena, is a tough night to compete on. Emotions run high as departing players bid farewell to their home courts.

For the Massachusetts women's basketball team, last night's 82-75 win over Rhode Island was powered by that emotion. The Minutewomen had not only the chance to beat a budding rival in URI, but also to secure a second seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament and go undefeated for the season in the William D. Mullins Center.

UMass 82
URI 75

"Senior Nights are tough," Rhode Island coach Linda Ziemke said.

For the first 15 minutes of the game the Minutewomen (19-8, 11-5 Atlantic 10) and the Lady Rams (20-6, 13-3) traded leads, with Rhode Island gaining valuable points off early UMass fouls. In the first half, the Lady Rams went to the line 13 times, connecting on eight attempts.

With 5:35 remaining in the first half, junior guard Beth Kuzmeski sank a three-pointer to put the Minutewomen up for good, 31-30. With a pair of free throws from senior forward Octavia Thomas and a pair of jump shots from senior center Melissa Gurile, UMass went on an 11-4 run to wrap up the game's first stanza. The teams headed to the locker room with Massachusetts up, 42-37.

The Massachusetts defense held Rhode Island to under 500 shooting in the first half, allowing the Lady Rams to connect on only 13 shots. Standout guard Dayna Smith was limited to only three points, but she dished out four assists.

Gurile and Thomas, along with fellow senior Tricia Hopson, let the momentum of Senior Night take over as the Minutewomen continued to roll in the second half, coming away with the win 82-75.

Massachusetts tried to put the game away, leading by as many as 15 at three different points in the game. The Lady Rams kept the victory within reach, however, hitting key three-pointers at crucial moments.

Smith came away from the game with 18 points, all on treys.

Gurile and Thomas were outstanding in their final home appearance, both chipping in for 26 points. Gurile pulled down eight rebounds and blocked three shots, while Thomas came away with six boards and dished out three assists. Hopson was also solid in her final stand at the Mullins Center, going a perfect 4-for-4 from the charity stripe, while scoring six points.

Junior forward Crystal Carroll played well, despite early foul trouble, going 5-for-7 to score 10 points. Carroll also grabbed six boards and rejected two shots. Kuzmeski handed out a game-high and career-high nine assists, while connecting for five points.

After the game, UMass coach Joanie O'Brien was pleased with her team's effort.

"Without a doubt it was a team effort," O'Brien said. "I thought Tricia and Sabriya made good decisions, they got our running game going.

"It's kind of fitting for these four kids [seniors] to go out with this win at the Mullins Center, with the kind of crowd and enthusiasm they had. They deserved it."

The seniors tried to downplay the evening's ceremonies.

Highlights...

The first half UMass and URI kept the score close until Sabriya Mitchell sank a three-pointer with 3:48 remaining putting the Minutewomen up 34-30... UMass kept the lead for the rest of the first half enterring the locker room 42-37... UMass openned the second half with a 15-2 run and held the lead the rest of the way... Not even 15 points off 5 second half three-pointers by Dayna Smith could resurrect a URI win... Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile both earned 26 points in the evening... Beth Kuzmeski tallied a season high 9 assists... The victory gives UMass the No. 2 spot in the A-10 east.

Seniors anchor UMass run towards post-season honors

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Last night the Massachusetts women's basketball team pulled off one of their biggest victories of the season in a 82-75 win over Rhode Island.

After last Saturday's 68-66 loss to St. Bonaventure, the Minutewomen needed a win to secure second place and the No. 2 seed in the Atlantic 10 East, for a first round bye in the conference tournament.

The chips were down and UMass had to produce.

The win improved Massachusetts' record to 19-8, 11-5 in the A-10 and Rhode Island dropped to 20-6, 13-3 in the A- 10, while still holding on the No. 1 spot in the East.

Making this victory even sweeter was the fact that this big win came in the final home match for the four senior Minutewomen Melissa Gurile, Octavia Thomas, Tricia Hopson and Nicole Carter.

Last night, All-American candidates Thomas and Gurile led UMass in scoring with 26 points apiece, successfully intimidating a struggling Rams offense. Hopson played a superb game teaming up with guard Sabriya Mitchell to run the offense.

Standout Rhode Island guard Dayna Smith (18 points, 6- for-13 from three-point land) found the tenacity of the UMass squad, anchored by the fired up senior tandem of Thomas and Gurile, hard to handle.

"You always want to go out with a bang in your final game," Smith said. "It was obvious that they really wanted this one."

Stepping up and forming the nucleus of the team is not something new for the four seniors, but something they have done throughout their UMass tenure.

These four players comprise coach Joanie O'Brien's first recruiting class in her five years at the helm for the Minutewomen. Through their hard work and improvement, they have climbed up the ranks of the Atlantic 10.

Perhaps it is only fitting that their final victory came against Rhode Island.

"Their four seniors and our four seniors have brought programs along that no one thought would go quite so far, quite so fast," O'Brien said.

Last night's win over the Rams tied the school record for most wins in a season (19) which was set last season when UMass took second place in the A-10 Tournament, its best finish ever.

Breaking records is not something new for these four women.

To say that Gurile was a four-year starter would be an understatement. She did not just start, but started in every single game in four years. In addition to earning All- Conference honors for the past three years, she was chosen for the preseason A-10 first team this season and has set the school record for blocks with 168. With 13 career double- doubles, Gurile is second in the A-10 in field goal percentage (55.6 percent), blocks (1.58 bpg), and has shot over 60 percent from the field on 13 occasions.

As for Thomas, she broke the all-time rebounding record with six

After getting its 26-game winning streak snapped by George Washington last Saturday, the No. 2 Massachusetts men's basketball team (26-1) will try to start a new streak tonight against St. Joseph's.

Tonight's 7 p.m. matchup at the William D. Mullins Center is also the last home game ever for the five UMass seniors: Dana Dingle, Donta Bright, Rigoberto Nunez, Ted Cottrell and Giddel Padilla.

"It's their senior night, so Dingle and Bright are going to be on," St. Joseph's coach Phil Martelli said. "There will be chants for [Marcus] Camby to stay one more year — I'll be leading chant for 'leave, leave, leave.' It's going to make it a more difficult challenge for ourselves.

"We're not going to sneak up on them. We're not going there to surrender, we're not running up a white flag. We're going to go up there and see what happens."

The loss against the Colonials couldn't have come at a better time for the Minutemen, according to UMass coach John Calipari.

"At times you get intoxicated with success and you think it's going to be easy," he said. "I can tell you every

Bruins' mediocrity adds to a dip in town's image

We're taught not to base much on first impressions, but when we look back at the Boston Bruins season of 1995-96, we'll wonder why we didn't have it all figured out after their first game of the year, a ho-hum 4-4 tie to the New York Islanders.

It's been that kind of a season for the B's; not a total loss, but with little sense of victory. They certainly had a lot to pitch to us— new building (boring), new uniforms (so-so), new players (so-so and boring), it was all new and all good.

I guess everyone forgot that all that old stuff was great for a while. The Celtics have surprised no one in their continued mediocrity, but when that is coupled with the Bruins' dip into the class of their basketball building mates, the image of Boston pro sports we're left with looks more like a Picasso than a Renoir; it's quite strange and difficult to comprehend. The city seems to have shed all its tradition and lore in becoming just another sports town, with ordinary teams in an ordinary arena playing their way to ordinary records.

What's worse is the Bruins' little tease in the form of an encouraging 4-2-1 road trip. Trouble is, their upcoming schedule (multiple meetings with the Rangers, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Montreal and red-hot Buffalo) that it appears they will play without Cam Neely, could well spell doom in their 11th hour charge for the playoffs.

You remember Neely, the team's leading goal scorer for most of the last decade. Still need help? One of the two guys benched for an entire game a while back in Toronto, the one who didn't get traded. Last clue: the third musketeer who along with Mario Lemieux and Gary Roberts is one of the three most resilient NHL stars of this era.

I'm disturbed by the public perception of Neely. People think he's lazy, he's overrated, he doesn't come through in the clutch. For heaven's sake, it's a wonder the man has any feeling left in his body. How many times has it looked like his career was over, then he's managed yet another miraculous return?

The Bruins are not going to make the playoffs without him, you can take that to the bank. But I suspect many fans will be relieved if he calls it quits. After all, the Bruins are simply loaded with gutty snipers, anyone of whom can just step in for Neely, the lazy, overrated choker.

No way. Few players care more

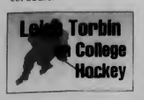
Mascot attacks; LSS makes run to playoffs

This very un-serious person has to take a moment to address a crucial issue that is plaguing sports today and creeping into college hockey: mascot abuse.



Lehigh Torbin College Hockey

I, like anyone else, suffer agonizing pains from laughing at the E S P N "SportsCenter" hosts as they pummel the Syracuse Orangeman in promos for the show, and got a chuckle out of the Salt Lake City youngsters who pulverized the Phoenix Suns' Gorilla Monday night at the Delta Center with whiffleball bats. The scene where Jean-Claude Van Damme killed a potential assailant disguised as the Pittsburgh Penguins mascot in Sudden Death, was one of the film's few inventive moments, a whimsical fight to the death.

This is all either jestful, good-natured fun or Hollywood make-believe. There is no harm done, unlike what happened to Minnesota's Goldy the Gopher a few weeks back, when an overzealous 25-year-old graduate of the university leaped out of the stands and beat up his alma mater's mascot.

In the final minutes of a tightly contested game against No. 1 Colorado College, Jeffrey Norman Baker pushed Goldy off of a railing which he was leading cheers from, and put him in a headlock, twisting his head.

Thomas Lord, the 22-year old junior advertising major who works as Goldy, has filed suit against Baker on a fifth degree assault charge.

"Little kids will pinch you or twist your arm to see if you're real," Lord said. While dealing with pestering children is common in his line of work, in two years of mascot duty, Lord does not recall being physically attacked and assaulted by an adult before.

• It's late in February which means that it's about time for Lake Superior State to make a charge towards a national championship. Coach Jeff Jackson's teams tend to linger in the middle of the pack for the majority of the season and then charge into the playoffs. Unlike Dale Earnhardt, who used the strategy at this year's Daytona 500, the Lakers usually catch everyone in sight.

It has been the same old song and dance at the Soo this year, as the Lakers are 5-1-1 in their last seven and used a sweep of then-No. 3 Michigan this weekend to climb into that spot in this week's poll.

The Lakers came from behind three times in Friday's 5-4 overtime win over the Wolverines and used four power play goals and a shorthanded goal to pound Michigan 7-3 the following night. Entering the game, Michigan had killed an incomprehensible 89 percent of its penalties (160 of 179).

Lake State is one of four teams with a chance to take the CCHA regular season title heading into this final weekend, which will see the Lakers face the softest opponents of the four schools (Ohio State and Miami of Ohio).

The Lakers fell only once in the month of

5 College rally set to protest alleged frat rape

By Anna Lotto
Collegian Staff

A Five College rally protesting the alleged recent rape on fraternity row will take place tomorrow at 4 p.m. at Haigis Mall.

The march, being organized by members of Third Wave, a young feminist group, will begin at the mall and march down North Pleasant Street towards "frat row," ending in front of the Pi Kappa Alpha (Pike) fraternity house.

According to police files, one woman reported being raped on the night of Feb. 9. Although police have not identified the location of the alleged rape, flyers have alleged Pike in connection with the incident.

While at this time only one alleged rape has been officially reported to police, rumors of at least one more incident of sexual assault are circulating around campus.

The concern of the protest, according to Dia Sokol, a Smith College student and organizer from Third Wave, is to "raise consciousness among people that rape is everyone's problem."

Sokol also said that the rally is meant to bring attention to the link between fraternities and sexual violence.

No new developments have been released in connection with the alleged incident, as many sources claim details would hurt the investigation. However, Director of Greek Affairs Michael Wiseman said he believes the alleged assailant was a "non-member" of the fraternity house. He also said that he supports any efforts to bring awareness to the problem of sexual assault because, through his experience as both Greek director and a resident assistant, "never enough attention can be brought to the issue."

The president of Pike was unable to be reached, and another member did not wish to comment about the rally or the incident.

Many students are also worried that women who have been assaulted are afraid of coming forward for fear of the power held within the Greek system.

The current commonly-known statistic is one in four college women will be sexually assaulted within her four years in college. Junior Jillian Ryan echoed this common opinion.

"Women do get raped and we don't hear about it because so many cases go unreported," she said.

The march will go down the left side of "frat row" and come back up the right side, ending with a list of demands at the Pike house. Flyers around campus erroneously identified the end destination at Pi Kappa Epsilon.

Sokol said the march is intended specifically to address fraternities, because of their reputation for degrading and harassing females. The protest will also involve the distribution of informational materials concerning sexual violence and resources for victims.

Although the rally is expected to draw a large number of people, Sokol said that if a similar incident were to occur again "twice as many of us will show up."

Congress targets Cuba with rapidly passed sanctions

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Rushing to punish Cuba, Congress and President Clinton agreed Wednesday on new sanctions that would bridle foreign investment with the goal of removing Fidel Castro.

The White House, seeking to avoid a veto, accepted controversial language in a Cuba sanctions bill that will allow American citizens to sue foreign investors who make use of property in Cuba confiscated during the 3 1/2 decades of Castro's rule.

In a compromise, the president is given the authority to waive that right to sue but for no more than six months at a time, when the national interest is involved.

White House officials, anxious over the lawsuit provisions that could antagonize U.S. allies, wrestled with Republican lawmakers on the bill's final language but appeared resigned to quick passage.

"The bill's got a lot of problems that we hope can be fixed," White House press secretary Mike McCurry said before the agreement was reached. He said President Clinton "wants to sign that bill now in light of the incident Saturday."

Cuba's shooting down of two small American planes off the Cuban coast Saturday galvanized Congress to complete a Cuba sanctions bill passed in different versions by the House and Senate last fall but held up by administration objections to several controversial provisions.

In light of the attack on the planes flown by Cuban-American pilots, House and Senate negotiators say they will forfeit on the tougher House version. Castro's 3 1/2-decade rule.

SGA tackles food services issue

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

In a rare show of unity, the Student Government Association (SGA) Senate unanimously passed three motions that will seek to make on-campus dining options and facilities more accommodating to all students in their meeting Wednesday night.

The motions, co-sponsored by Sen. Bill Ramsey and Sen. Rob McDonald, will be presented today to director of Auxiliary Services Ashoke Ganguli in a prearranged meeting with the Senators.

To provide for students who take night classes and are unable to fit dinner into their schedule, the Senate is requesting that all Dinning Commons remain open until 8 p.m.

"A lot of students have expressed to me that they miss dinner because of classes," Ramsey said. "This is a basic service."

In addition, the Senate is demanding that breakfast be made available in the Franklin Dining Commons.

Currently, residents of the Central Residential Area and the Orchard Hill Residential Area are required to walk to the Worcester Dining Commons to be served breakfast.

"Breakfast is real cheap," Ramsey said. "There is no reason why this can not be made available to students."
